The ground carpet of Carmel is equally varied. Every open space in March is covered with flowers, many of them identical with those which occur in the south, but later in their time of appearing—valerians, red linums, gladiolus, a pink convolvulus, a large red antirrhinum, ranunculuses and pheasant's eye (Adonis), of endless variety in size and colour, and as large and brilliant as the anemone, which is now out of flower; the tufts of cyclamen are still in blossom among the roots of the shrubs and in the crevices of the rocks, and the tall red hollyhock (Althæa acaulis) towers above the rest, whether in the glens or from the crannies of the cliffs. In and under Mount Carmel we found our first orchideous plants in Palestine, Serapias cordigera (?); and five species of orchis, O. palustris, growing in the swamps of the Kishon, with flower-spikes a foot long, and other species which we could not succeed in drying for identification; the curious Ophrys atrata, with its dark bee-like lip, another Ophrys resembling the spider orchis, a third like the man orchis, and another which looked like a large and fine variety of the drone orchis. Four species of Onosma, and especially the brilliant yellow O. syriacum, hung from the rocks. It was the garden of Eden run wild. But before May had begun all was over.

Under Carmel, too, we first observed the mandrake, one of the most curious and peculiar plants of the country (Mandragora officinalis). It is twice mentioned in Scripture, once as growing in Mesopotamia, "Reuben found mandrakes in the field, and brought them unto his mother Leah" (Gen. xxx. 14); and "The mandrakes give a smell, and at our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits" (Cant. vii. 13). The mandrake pushes very early in the season, and sends up a large disk of very broad primrose-like leaves, which lies flat on the ground, without any foot-stalk. The leaves are often four inches in width and thrice that length, and in their centre shoots up a thick bunch of dark-blue bell-shaped blossoms, which afterwards yield a yellowish berry the size of a plum, with a pleasant sweetish pulp, prized by the natives both as a fruit and medicinally as an opiate. It has a long top root, smaller than that of the parsnip, with a pungent smell, which is cooked for food, though rather disagreeable to European palates. The blossom has a pleasant, pungent odour, unlike that of any other plant, but not fetid or disagreeable. We afterwards found the mandrake in most of the plains of northern Palestine, especially where the soil was soft and peaty.

Mount Carmel intersects the long maritime plains of Palestine, dividing that of Sharon on the south from those of Acre and Esdraelon on the north. The botanical characters of all these are similar, and less interesting than those of any other part of the country. They are all more or less cultivated, and little space is left for the indigenous flora. The most attractive plants of the plains are those near the Kishon on the one side, and in the marshes of the Crocodile river on the other. In both of these occurs the splendid Papyrus syriacus, very closely allied to the classic papyrus of the Nile, and among the brakes of which the crocodile is believed still to linger. Here, too, the tamarisk and the willow abound, and the marsh orchis and gladiolus covered many a patch with a sheet of crimson. The rose of Sharon no longer grows on the plains, but, as has just been stated, is most abundant on the hills.

The whole of these plains are from time to time under cultivation, though after the rudest fashion. The soil is alluvial, and of exuberant fertility. Manure is never used, and the fellahin from the villages on the hills, or the inhabitants of the towns on the coast, claim their respective shares of the plains, according to certain ancient and recognised landmarks. Each autumn they scratch the surface with their wooden ploughs, harrow it with brushwood, and throw in their seed. Wheat or barley is sown time after time, till the soil shows symptoms of exhaustion, when it is simply left fallow, often for three or four years, to yield a spontaneous crop of thistles and knapweed (centaurea). Barley is grown perhaps to a larger extent than wheat, as it is not only largely employed for human food, but is the sole provender for horses and cattle in travelling, or when the grass crops are over. There seems to be but one variety cultivated, a fine bright grain, with well-filled ears and very silvery hue. The crops are often equal to those of our better cultivated fields. Not so the wheat crops, which are very light, though the individual ears are large, but so few in number that persons may walk or ride through the standing corn without treading it down. The wheat is all bearded. The most hardy sort has a black beard and husk, and in two varieties the beard is fully as long as in any barley. Everywhere the barley harvest is a month in advance of the wheat, though the latter is generally over by the end of May. It was interesting to hear our muleteers using the expressions of "wheat harvest," "barley harvest," to mark the date of past occurrences, just as the phrases occur in sacred history—"time of wheat-harvest," "time of barley harvest" (Judg. xv. 1; 2 Sam. xxi. 9., &c.).

Occasionally in the plain of Sharon we noticed patches of millet, mentioned as an ingredient of bread by Ezekiel (iv. 9). The plant looks very much like a luxuriant broad-leaved grass, for which, indeed, we took it at first. The ear is solid and heavy but the grain very small, yet it yields abundantly, and is considered a profitable crop, while the straw is finer and more nourishing for cattle than that of wheat or barley. Oats of course do not exist in so low a latitude, and rye we never observed to be cultivated in Palestine. Perhaps the "rye" of Ex. iv. 32, is a synonym for spelt, a coarse wheat.

In many places, especially where the soil was strong, lentiles were cultivated instead of grain. They are a species of vetch (Ervum lens), and have, when growing, very much the appearance of a very poor field of vetches in England. The pod is larger, and the lentiles give a good yield. When threshed out they are used for human food in various ways. Thus, in Gen. xxv. 34, "Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentiles." "And Barzillai the Gileadite brought . . . lentiles for David" (2 Sam. xvii. 28). "Take thou lentiles and make thee bread thereof" (Ezek. iv. 9). We certainly preferred lentile pottage, which was equal to vermicelli soup, to the lentile bread, which was bitter, heavy, and coarse.

While these were the crops of the cultivated parts of the plains, the fallow portion was covered with a prickly wilderness of tall thistles, artichokes, and knapweeds, which afforded shelter and security to the gazelle and the wild boar. The predominant plants were a very large artichoke (Cynara sp. ?) Many species of knapweed (centaurea), with blossoms, some blue, some yellow, some white, and some purple, but however differing in colour and shape, all agreeing in the abundance and the sharpness of their crowded spines: Prasium majus, Acanthus spinosus, Ononis antiquorum, and a tall labiate, ten feet high, whose leaves were edged with prickles of the most penetrating power; and occasionally a tall white hollyhock, Althæa filicifolia. So tall was this wilderness of thorns and briars, that the heads of the gazelles could scarcely be seen as they bounded through it. Thorns, indeed, and thistles are the characteristics of Palestine weeds, whether in the thickets of Jericho, or on the plains of Sharon and Galilee. Some of them are so strong, that in reclaiming the fallow the ploughmen do not take the trouble to clear them, but only plough round them. Many an expression in the imagery of Holy Writ is brought to mind by the sight of these thorny plains. "Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and briers" (Is. xxxii. 13). "The thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars" (Hos. x. 8). "Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee" (Gen. iii. 18). "I will tear your flesh with the thorns of the wilderness and with briers" (Jud. viii. 7). "And there shall be no more a pricking brier unto the house of Israel, nor any grieving thorn of all that are round about them" (Ez. xxviii. 24). "That which beareth thorns or briers is rejected" (Heb. vi. 8). Among the other weeds is frequently to be seen a gigantic umbelliferous plant (Conium sp. ?) probably the hemlock of Hosea x. 4: "Judgment springeth up as hemlock in the furrows of the field." "Ye have turned the fruit of righteousness into hemlock" (Amos vi. 12).

Most of the fruit-trees mentioned in Scripture are to be found in the gardens round Jaffa (Joppa), Caiffa, Tyre and Sidon, the most extensive orchards in the country. Many of these we have already mentioned, as the date-palm, fig, almond, and pomegranate. The orange and the lemon, now so common, and the chief product of Jaffa, are more modern introductions, and the citron was the only fruit of the kind cultivated during the Scripture period. The quince is very common, and is called the apple, yet though fragrant and tempting-looking, it is astringent and disagreeable when eaten raw, but is largely used in making the conserves and sweetmeats, of which the Eastern ladies are so fond. The true apple we hardly ever saw except in highest mountain regions, nor will it flourish in so warm a climate. Several writers who have talked of it as grown at Askelon and Jaffa have evidently confounded the quince and the apple. But the tappuach or "apple" of our version must refer to some fruit well known and esteemed. It was a fragrant fruit: "the smell of thy nose (is) like apples" (Cant. vii. 8), and a beautiful fruit, "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver" (Prov. xxv. 11). I would identify this fruit with the apricot. Everywhere the apricot is cultivated, and yields most abundant crops from Damascus to Jaffa. Next to the fig, it is the fruit of most general consumption, and certainly can yield to none either for fragrance or for beauty. Nor is there any reason to believe that it is a very recent introduction into the country, or indeed that it has been introduced more recently than the vine, since both are natives of the same region, Eastern Armenia, and would naturally be among the very first cultivated fruits brought into Syria by its Mesopotamian colonists.

Under the shadow of these fruit orchards, in the gardens "watered by the foot," where the labourer turns with his foot the little rills from the well, to the roots of each tree, or round each bed in turn; are cultivated carrots, onions, pumpkins, melons, and above all, cucumbers. The water-melon is also largely grown on the sandy hillocks outside, and reaches an enormous size, equalling the pumpkin in bulk and weight. "The lodge in the garden of cucumbers"—the rude wattled hut, where some decrepid old fellâh sits from morning to night, and from night to morning, to scare away the wild boars and jackals, "the little foxes that spoil the grapes," and to warn off human pilferers—may still be seen in many a plot of unfenced or ill-paved garden ground, an apt type of squalor and desolation. The consumption of melons, and especially of cucumbers, is prodigious, nor have the indigestible qualities of the latter been as yet discovered in the East. The ordinary dinner of the children of the poorer class is a hunch of barley or millet bread, with two good-sized cucumbers, which are eaten with the rind, and on which the lads thrive and are hearty. We habitually followed their example without any ill effects.

When from the plains we ascend into the less sultry hill-country of Galilee, there is little new to remark in the botany. Visiting, as we did, the neighbourhood of Tabor and Nazareth almost monthly from November to June, we had an opportunity of noticing the succession of its flowers, from the very earliest appearance of the crocus after the autumnal rains, to the last arums and astragaluses which survive the scorching heats of May. The frosts of winter are seldom severe, as is evidenced by the predominance of the olive tree in all the sheltered valleys, while in some favoured nooks, even close to Nazareth, the date palm bears its fruit. But on the whole we feel we are approaching a more northern flora. The woods about Tabor and to the north are composed generally of the same trees as clothe Carmel, but the proportions are changed, the oaks more decidedly predominate, the wild olive has disappeared, the storax tree is less abundant, while the hardier shrubs, as the bay tree, partially supplant it, the woodbine (Lonicera implexa) becomes common, and in the higher grounds we notice for the first time the wild pear tree.

In some of the olive-yards the oriental mistletoe (Viscum cruciatum) grows in profusion on every tree, and is the staple food of the noisy jays which swarm there, while its solid mass of glossy but deep green foliage and bright crimson berries, relieve with much beauty the blue foliage and purple fruit of the tree which supports it. This mistletoe seems, however, to be more tender than the olive tree, and we did not observe it on the higher grounds, while as we approach Hermon, we find the European mistletoe (Viscum album) on the poplars. The walnut tree gradually supplants the olive in the higher parts of Galilee, and its fruit is gathered green for the manufacture of oil.

But in its floral riches Galilee certainly surpasses the plains, and rivals the hill country of Judæa. Labiates and leguminous plants abound, the catalogue of the names of which could only interest the botanical student. These supply the inhabitants of Galilee with one of their staple products in the honey which they yield. The bees are not here wild as in the southern wilderness, though of the same species, Apis fasciata (erroneously named by me Apis ligustica at p. 488). Every peasant in Galilee is a bee-master, and the hives, which are simply great tubes of half-burnt clay, about a yard and a half long, and closed at each end with mud, excepting a small aperture in the middle, are piled one upon another to the number of from twenty to thirty in the form of a pyramid in the yard of every house. Dead boughs of trees are stuck around them, partly for shade and partly to assist the bees in alighting. Their bee is smaller than ours, more wasp-like in appearance, with bright yellow bands on the abdomen; and the produce of honey is enormous, while the stocks are never, after the barbarous fashion too common in this country, destroyed so soon as they have stored a harvest for their owners.

The mandrake is common in moist places throughout Galilee, and in early spring the glorious scarlet anemone (A. coronaria) is resplendent on hill-side, in valley, and in corn-field alike. Besides these, two species of tulip, one striped and the other red (Tulipa gesneriana and T. montana?), are often found side by side with the grape hyacinth (Muscari racemosum) on the stony slopes. Under the shrubs in shady places are many species of arum, Dracunculus vulgaris, Colocasia antiquorum, and at least half-a-dozen species of the more restricted genus arum, some of them, and those the most gorgeous, emitting an odour so insupportably fetid, that they poisoned the botany box, in which an incautious collector had placed them, for days afterwards. Later in the season the most attractive flowers were of the iris family, most of them preferring the shade of woods on the north of Tabor, and near Keder (Kedesh Napthali). Some were of surpassing loveliness, but so delicate and soft that we could not preserve them, and were compelled to be content with drawings kindly furnished by Mrs. Zeller of Nazareth, in order to identify them. The most conspicuous of these has been written of, though not described, by Dr. Thomson, under the name of the Huleh lily. It is a very large tuberous-rooted iris, pink, with rich purple blotches.

When from the hills of Galilee we descend to the calm basin of the Lake of Gennesareth, or to the wide-spreading swamps of Huleh (Merom), we again meet with a semi-tropical flora, Fagonia, Zizyphus, and various Astragali, and some gorgeous convolvuluses, especially Ipomea palmata, overhanging the circular fountain of Gennesareth; the castor-oil tree (Ricinus communis), supposed, but erroneously, to be the gourd of the prophet Jonah, grows here to a great size; and the brilliant little sun-bird suspends its nest from its leaves. The wild-rose, of three species yet undetermined, occurred to us here for the first time in Palestine, far more showy and conspicuous than our species, the sheet of snow-white blossom of one kind contrasting finely with the rich pink of the oleander, with which it was intermingled. The shores of both the lakes are fringed with oleanders in their full beauty at the end of April, and in the marshes of Huleh a small tamarisk (Tamarix pallasii) with feathery plumes of pink catkins, gracefully blend with the oleander and the papyrus.

The papyrus of the sea of Galilee and of Huleh is peculiarly interesting. It is not the Papyrus syriacus of the coast, but a distinct and finer species, P. antiquorum, the true papyrus of ancient Egypt, the bulrush of which the ark which saved the infant Moses was constructed, the depository of all the learning of the old Egyptians. It still preserves its ancient name in the Arabic "Babeer," handed down to us in our familiar "paper." On the lower Nile it has been long extinct, nor is it found in Egypt or Nubia, and only in Abyssinia 4° N. of the equator. Yet here it lingers on the plain of Gennesareth, and is abundant in the waters of Merom. It is the finest species of the bulrush tribe, or Cyperaceæ. The stem, which sometimes reaches the length of sixteen feet, springs from a dense mass of root in the water or floating mud, sheathed at first in many leaves, but very soon standing out quite bare, and is sharply triangular, each of the three equilateral sides being about three inches at the thickest part. The stem is surmounted by a large feathery tuft or umbel of long spiculæ, about a foot long, which droops gracefully on one side, and supplies an excellent fly-flip to the natives. Its application to literature has long been lost, and it is now only cut down to form the matting with which the Bedouins of the district construct the huts which serve them in lieu of tents.

Sheltered by the papyrus in the shallower parts of Lake Huleh are acres of water-lily, both yellow and white, of our English species, Nymphæa alba and Nuphar lutea. We did not observe these in any other part of Palestine. The floating brakes of papyrus afford shelter to thousands of ducks and herons of the rarest species, as the white egret; while the beautiful purple gallinule or great water-hen, probably the "swan" of our English Bible, may often be seen by a patient observer, with its great red feet daintily treading on the floating leaves of the water-lily, the under surface of which are covered with myriads of the peculiar fresh-water shells of the lake, Neritina jordani and Melanopsis costata, which almost form the shingle of the sea of Galilee.

In the neighbourhood of Huleh, as in the maritime plains, the cultivation of cotton has recently received a great impulse, and we saw large tracts laid down for its growth, which have probably remained fallow since the days of the Crusaders.

On ascending from the banks of the upper Jordan towards Hermon and Lebanon, the flora entirely changed. The olive, which flourishes at Banias (Cæsarea Philippi), becomes stunted at Hasbeiya, and at Rasheiya gives place altogether to the walnut. When from Rasheiya we make the ascent of Hermon, at almost every step we come upon some member of a semi-Alpine or Alpine flora, quite new to us, and of course not found in the lower altitudes of the Holy Land. With one notable exception—the cedar—none of the peculiar plants of the northern mountain ranges can be looked on as Scriptural, but geographically and botanically they can scarcely be surpassed in interest.

A little out of the ordinary route, between Hasbeiya and Rasheiya, is to be seen the finest tree in Syria, though quite unknown—the oak of Libbeiya. It is an evergreen oak (Quercus pseudo-coccifera), of the same species as the oak of Mamre. At four feet from the ground, the narrowest part, it measures thirty-seven feet in circumference, and at about six feet it begins to send out its lateral branches, each a fine piece of timber in itself. The tree forms a perfectly symmetrical dome, covering a circumference of over ninety yards, and extending with even sweep to within five feet of the ground in an exact circle, trimmed artificially to that height by the browsing of the cattle.

In the valley of the Leontes, not very far from Libbeiya, at El Kuweh, is one of the best botanical fields in northern Palestine, and the only spot where eight species of fern may be gathered close together. During two or three days by the Leontes and on Hermon, we collected more additional species of plants than we had done in the previous three months of our journeyings.

On Hermon itself, above the line of the oak forests, when the trees begin to dwindle into coppice, there is no timber at all, and we did not observe any species of pine. At the height of 4000 feet we lost the trees, and thenceforward there was nothing larger than the little bushes of the pretty Cerasus prostrata, a very dwarf cherry, with an exquisite red blossom. There were several species of prickly astragalus bushes, particularly A. coluteoides, with clusters of axillary pale yellow flowers buried behind the defence of its spines. It deserves note as one of the plants from which gum-tragacanth (translated "spicery" and "spices" in Gen. xxxvii. 25, and xliii. 11) is obtained. Other plants growing only at the height of above 4000 feet, were the pretty little poppy, Papaver rhœas, Glaucium vitellinum, the little Rosa spinosissima, Lepidium sativum (our common cress), Alsine juniperina, several Galiums, the Persian goatsbeard, (Tragopogon persicum), an alkana, myosotis (or Forget-me-not), a speedwell (Veronica polifolia), six or seven salvias or sages, and many other less conspicuous plants. Hermon is within a few feet of 10,000 feet in height, and is abundantly clothed with alpine plants to its very summit. At or near the top we found a Fumaria, Draba vesicaria, and D. villosa, Geranium tuberosum and Bierberstenia multifida, the pretty little primrose, Androsace villosa, two anchusas, the beautiful little blue Ixolirion montanum, a very beautiful red tulip, and a Fritillaria, neither of which were we able to identify. The three latter were pushing forth their blossoms just at the edge of the melting snow in the month of June.

Lebanon, though generally a counterpart, as we might expect, of Hermon in its botany, yet has some marked features in contrast with it, especially in its wood. Unlike Hermon, or Anti-Lebanon, Lebanon is only bare where the hand of man has denuded it. The flowers of Hermon generally occur again on Lebanon, and we noticed many others in addition, especially the common berberry, and on the very highest ridge of Lebanon, over the cedar-grove, among the melting snow, the lovely little Daphne oleoides was covered with a profusion of white blossom, with a perfume richer and stronger than the jasmine. Then there was many a tree mentioned in Scripture along with "the glory of Lebanon . . . the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary" (Is. lx. 13). Unless where man has cleared them for the mulberry, the lower slopes of Lebanon are still clad with oak, and ash, and cedar, and cypress. Higher up, the gnarled juniper is more sparingly scattered; while in the rugged recesses of many an unexplored ravine the Syrian bear still scrambles among the relics of the primæval forests, among the mingled pine-trees, junipers, and that with which we may fitly close our reminiscences of the flora of the Holy Land,—the cedar of Lebanon.

It was long supposed that it was alone in the secluded grove above Hazrun that "the cedar in Lebanon" could now be seen, "with fair branches, and with a shadowy shroud, and of a high stature," that cedar of which we read, "the fir-trees were not like his boughs, and the chestnut-trees were not like his branches, nor any tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty" (Ez. xxxi. 3, 8). The cedars of this famed grove are indeed unrivalled in grandeur and majesty, yet in many other nooks of the Lebanon, not only on the western face, but in the southern spurs, and even on the east side of the Lebanon, where they were not anticipated, large tracts of cedar forest have been found. They are unfortunately grievously pillaged, being recklessly destroyed for firewood, but enough remains to prove the ancient empire of the cedar, in the days when, not confined to ravines too inaccessible or too poor to tempt agriculture, or to heights too cold to permit profitable cultivation, it so frequently suggested the glorious and majestic imagery of the prophets. As I have elsewhere remarked ("Land of Israel," p. 636), "The prophets spoke to men to whom the splendour of these monarchs of the forest was familiar. In the cedars of the famous grove, we have living evidence handed down to us, that that imagery was no exaggeration. The scattered relics on other parts of the mountain are a living evidence that the range of the cedar was wide-spread, and, therefore, that illustrations from it were familiar and forcible."

H. B. Tristram.

THE GERMAN FAMILY IN LONDON.

One September day there was an open-air missionary meeting in the neighbourhood of Barmen, in the lovely Wupperthal. The friends of missions in the vicinity had flocked together from all quarters. There was scarcely a village within a circuit of ten miles which did not send its minister with his deacons and the better portion of his church members. Men and women, old and young, rich and poor, crowded together, exhibiting that true and wonderful equality and fraternity, which political communism can at best but caricature, and nothing but Christian communion can realise. On a small platform, under the broad foliage of a gigantic beech tree, some of the leaders of the mission were sitting in committee, directing the proceedings of the day. At a distance, amidst the slender stems of tall firs, between which the September sun cast his cheerful rays, long rows of tables and forms were placed to accommodate the numerous guests at dinner-time, when a roll, a bit of meat, and a cup of coffee would refresh them for the work of the afternoon.

Several speakers, famous for their eloquence or their practical knowledge of mission-work, addressed the assembly. Each speech was closed with a hymn, and in the pauses hymn after hymn was raised by the people themselves, making the forest and the neighbouring hills resound with the sweet melodies of the Deutschen Kirchenlieder. And when afterwards the people were seated at the tables, and the blessing was asked by the chairman, the speeches and the hymns were continued in uninterrupted succession, every one being desirous of expressing the feelings of his heart on this happy day, and of contributing something towards building up the congregation in their faith, hope, and love. And so it went on from hour to hour, till at last the long shadows of the firs announced the setting of the sun, and gave the signal for departure. In numerous groups, dotting the roads that crossed the hills in all directions, the people returned to their homes, keeping up the enthusiasm of the day by their evening hymns, which echoed through the valleys.

A little group walked up the steep road leading to the village of Kirchheim. It consisted of Hermann Stahl, the farmer, Peter Vormann, the schoolmaster, with their wives and children, and a few neighbours of the working class. Hermann and Peter were engaged in a lively conversation, to which the rest of the company listened evidently with great interest, the women now and then dropping in a word of affirmation, explanation, or correction. The subject regarded Hermann's plan of emigrating to America in the spring.

Hermann Stahl was a man in the prime of life, with a robust appearance, broad shoulders, and a manly face. On his little farm, which he cultivated with the ability of a well-taught husbandman, he had brought up a family of six children, who possessed in his wife a most kind and tender-hearted mother. With the exception of the eldest, a girl of eighteen, the children were boys, of whom the eldest was sixteen and the youngest six. They were a happy family, living in the midst of charming scenery, secluded from the din and bustle of the world, and enjoying the privileges and blessings of a truly Christian society, such as the little village of Kirchheim was blessed with. The minister of the place—for there was only one church at Kirchheim—was a pious man, a good preacher, and a still better pastor. Peter Vormann, the schoolmaster, was his friend; and everybody knows that when in a small village the pastor and the teacher agree, the whole population is in their hands for good or for evil. Happily, in this case, it was for good, for Peter spoke to the children at school of no other way of salvation than his friend the minister recommended to their parents at church. The people having thus, from time immemorial, been accustomed to meet as children in one and the same school, and as adults in one and the same church, it could not be any matter of wonder that the whole population of Kirchheim looked like one family, of which the minister was the father and the schoolmaster the eldest brother. Kirchheim was one of those happy villages, of which the remote hilly districts of Rhenish Prussia have always possessed a considerable number. The various changes in theological systems have found as little access to them as the shifting caprices of fashion, and consequently the old faith of the Reformers is there maintained intact, as well as the simplicity of patriarchal life. In those villages the pattern of the first Christian church at Jerusalem, the members of which "were of one heart and of one soul, having all things in common," is preserved as far as it is possible in our day. The people go in and out of each other's houses with as much freedom as though they were their own; and no wonder, for they were wont to do so as children, and the time for dropping the good custom has not, in their opinion, come round. They call each other, and each other's wives, by their Christian names, as familiarly as if they were brothers and sisters. They are often seen in summer time sitting in rows of six or eight on the benches near the front doors of the cottages, cheerfully chatting till the setting sun, or the chiming of the evening bell, calls them to their homes. In winter they spend their evenings in small companies, assembling in the houses by rotation, when many a good book is read, and many an interesting subject discussed. At these gatherings either the minister or the schoolmaster is generally present, and he usually gives such a tone to the conversation as promotes the religious knowledge and edification of the people. Pauperism or destitution is impossible in those places, unless some general calamity, such as a failure of the crops or an inundation, throws the whole of the population into distress. The people know each other too well not to know each other's wants, and they love one another too well not to try to help where help is possible.

Now Hermann Stahl was a member of one of these happy communities. Nor was he an insignificant member. He was an elder of the church, and was held in high esteem on account of his piety and respectable conduct. It would have been difficult to point to a man, in his position in life, who found himself in happier circumstances. His farm, though not very large, was yet sufficient for the support of himself and his family. He had attained the highest honours within the reach of an inhabitant of Kirchheim. He was everywhere received with cordial affection; all houses were open to him, and many hearts likewise, and into them he knew how to pour the consolations of the Gospel. No wonder, then, that the population was smitten with surprise when it was rumoured that Hermann contemplated emigrating to America. Everybody was put about by the news, for Hermann was always thought to be the most unlikely to need to have recourse to such a measure. The minister, the schoolmaster, and the elders of the church took the highest interest in the matter, for nobody desired to miss such a good man from the Kirchheim society. And besides, people thought, if he set the example, it was likely that more would follow, and what would then become of good old Kirchheim? So the first few days after the report had gone forth, Hermann's house was besieged by people inquiring whether it was really true, and trying to dissuade him from such an "absurd plan." In fact, he could scarcely show himself in the village street, without being accosted by friends, some of whom besought him even with tears in their eyes to consider well before it was too late.

Now, the reasons which induced Hermann to think of such a plan as exchanging the dearly beloved "fatherland" for a new and unknown world, were perhaps not so urgent as he thought, but neither were they so absurd as his friends and neighbours tried to make them appear. His first and chief reason was that he had little or no prospect of seeing his children established in circumstances similar to his own. Had they all been girls he might have cherished the hope of seeing them one day married to respectable farmers or tradesmen. But they were boys, as I have said, with the exception of Hannah, the eldest, and there was no opportunity in the village of training them up for anything but farming. Now, it was as clear as day that only one of them could get his father's farm after his death, and it was equally clear that the other brothers would have to hire themselves out as servants, without any prospect of becoming masters and owners of farms of their own. In America, on the contrary, they would have the world, as it were, before them. His brother Dietrich, of Hildesheim, had emigrated to Wisconsin six years before, with his wife and nine children, and had not only found himself in the most prosperous circumstances, but four of his sons were already owners of farms as thriving and productive as his own. In every letter this brother urged him to follow his example and cross the Atlantic. He wrote that there were "hundreds and thousands of acres of the most splendid arable land in the neighbourhood to be had for a mere trifle." Hermann would only have to come across and take possession, and within a few years he would see himself and his sons living like independent princes on their own estates.

On this Peter Vormann, the schoolmaster, would remark that it was all very plausible and alluring to read about in brother Dietrich's letter, but that it might turn out very different in reality. He remembered many who, with similar sanguine expectations, had emigrated to America only to die in poverty and destitution. He always repeated those beautiful words of the Psalmist in the 37th Psalm:—"Trust in the Lord and do good, so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." It was true that he (Peter) could not show Hermann how his four sons were to be provided with farms ten or fifteen years hence. But it appeared to him that Hermann might safely leave that matter in the hand of the Lord, who ten or fifteen years hence would prove the same faithful, wise, and mighty God and Helper that he had always proved before. If there were some urgent cause which imperatively necessitated his departure; if, for instance, it was shown that from year to year he was going backward in his domestic and monetary affairs, then Peter would be inclined to regard brother Dietrich's letters as so many voices from Heaven calling him from Germany to America, in the same way as Abraham had been called from Ur, or Israel out of Egypt, to emigrate to a land which the Lord had destined for them to dwell in. But since no such urgent cause existed, he thought it would be reckless imprudence and a presumptuous anticipation of God's dealings if he broke up his farm, and undertook such a long, perilous and uncertain voyage wholly of his own accord. He would be afraid lest the Lord might turn his antagonist, and withhold from him all those favours, without which even the most prosperous country becomes a desert, and the happiest home an abode of misery.

Hermann felt that there was much truth in this reasoning, although he could not quite share his friend's gloomy fears as to the possible consequences of his emigration. He could not see how the Lord could become an antagonist to a man who tried to improve his condition, since the desire for improvement was an instinct which had been implanted by God himself. It was true that as yet there was no urgent reason for removing, and he might quietly leave it to God to answer the question how to provide for his sons when they would come of age. But, thought he, Peter must admit that that sort of passive waiting upon the Lord might be dictated not only by pious humility, but also by easy-going selfishness, inasmuch as it was less trouble to him to leave matters as they were, and to tell his sons to care for themselves, than to travel to a distant country, and provide them with farms in time. He could not help remembering that text of Scripture, where the Apostle says that the children ought not to care for their parents, but the parents for their children. In his opinion, it was now the time to strike the iron. His sons were all of them young, and at the age when one easily learns a foreign language, and without much trouble adapts one's-self to the national character, the habits and customs of a foreign people. And as to the breaking-up of his farm, he believed that he would have to do that even apart from the emigration plan, owing to a railway which was to be made through the district. He saw no reason why, in that case, he should not go to America, where the largest farms were to be got at scarcely one-half the price of his own.

The next afternoon, the minister stepped into Hermann's room. He found Frau Stahl alone, and engaged in mending clothes. Hannah was in the dairy, and Hermann was away with the two eldest boys in the fields ploughing up a piece of land. The schoolmaster had taken the other boys out for a walk to the top of the Brunnenberg, which commanded a magnificent view of the surrounding district. The sun was now about setting, so that it was likely the father and the schoolmaster and the boys would be home shortly.

"Do you come to take your coffee with us to-night, Herr Pastor?" asked Frau Stahl, rising with a smile, and throwing the clothes on a chair in the corner. "Of course you do. Hermann will be back soon, and so will the master with the boys."

"Well, it was not exactly my intention to stay," answered the minister, in a cordial tone; "but since you are bent upon detaining me for a couple of hours, I suppose I must submit. But then, you know I must go and fetch my wife, for she would be sure to lecture me if I left her alone at home."

"Of course, of course, Herr Pastor; and I will send Hannah round to the Fallmings and the Müllers, that they also may come with their wives, and we'll have a nice evening together, with God's blessing."

An hour later a happy company of friends was gathered round Frau Stahl's white-scoured tea-table, which was bending under the weight of the bread and butter, and other dainties, which were all produced on Hermann's own farm, and made by the skill of his wife and daughter. While the guests enjoyed their neighbour's hospitality, the conversation chiefly concerned the missionary meeting of the preceding day. Portions of the speeches which had been delivered were recalled to memory, and incidents from the various missionary reports which had been read to the congregation were rehearsed with great sympathy. It was again observed that the difficulties and dangers which the faithful messengers of the Gospel had to encounter in the midst of uncivilised and often savage nations, and in unhealthy and inhospitable quarters of the globe, were very great; and at the close of the meal the minister gave out a missionary hymn, after which he and two or three other friends engaged in prayer, for the Divine protection to the gospel-preachers in heathen countries, and for the spread of the knowledge of Christ among those ignorant peoples.

Coffee over, the men took their pipes and the women their knitting-work, and opportunity was given for general conversation on interesting questions of the day. Usually, on such occasions, the host read a portion of the Bible or a page of some other religious book by way of suggesting a subject. This time Hermann, who was anxious to hear the opinions of his friends about his plan of emigration, read the first chapter of the book of Ruth, which tells of the emigration of Elimelech with his wife and sons to the country of Moab. This story, he said, clearly showed that emigration, though often attended with many trials and difficulties, might yet be a good thing, inasmuch as it might proceed from a justifiable motive, and be productive of excellent effects, both spiritual and temporal. That Elimelech's motive in emigrating from a land of starvation to a land of abundance was quite justifiable, nobody could reasonably deny. And that great blessings had been the consequence of his emigration was equally clear, since in the hand of Jehovah it was instrumental in restoring Naomi to honour and peace, and in bringing Ruth to the service of the only true and living God.

To this Fallming, the shoemaker, replied that the blessings which his friend pointed to were certainly consequences of Elimelech's emigration, but he held it was equally true that those blessings were brought about by Naomi's return. In his opinion, a man who could find no bread in his own country was perfectly justified in stepping over into another country, where he might find bread, but as, by God's blessing, matters were not yet at that pass in Germany, he did not see how his dear friend and brother Hermann could, with any show of reason, point to his position as being a parallel to that of Elimelech. Thank God, famine was unknown in the good country of the Ruhr and the Wupper. There was plenty of bread, both wheat and rye, and carrots in summer, and sour-crout in winter, and therefore he could not see why people should go all the way to America to seek for provisions which they could find in their own country quite as well.

In this view of the matter Frau Fallming perfectly agreed with her husband. Besides, she would have her dear friend Hermann observe that whatever may have been the blessings which accrued to others from Elimelech's emigration, no blessings flowed from it to himself. He died, and so did his sons, and it might be that these fatal calamities were chastisements from God, showing his displeasure at the step the family had taken. It would be a fearful thing even to suppose that Hermann and his sons might die in America in the same way, and that dear Frau Stahl and Hannah should come back, like Naomi and Ruth, clad in mourning and bathed in tears.

Tears filled the eyes of the good Frau, and the other female portion of the company were likewise moved; handkerchiefs soon covered their faces, and there was a solemn pause for a minute or two. Human faces, however, are very changeable in their expressions, as are human passions. The tears soon gave way to smiles, and even to scarcely-suppressed laughter, when Johann, Hermann's eldest son, a boy of sixteen, observed, with much simplicity, that, as it was not told in the chapter that they died from God's displeasure, it was much more natural to suppose that Elimelech and his sons, having come from a famine-stricken land to a country abounding with provisions, might have over-eaten themselves, and died from want of due self-restraint. Therefore, to guard against such a temptation, he thought it would be wise not to delay emigration till famine came into the land, but to start in such circumstances as would enable one to enter the new country with a full stomach.

Müller, the grocer, hereupon observed that there was sense in what the lad said. If emigration was inevitable, it was far better to carry it out in affluent than in straitened circumstances. But it was not certain that affluence at the beginning always secured affluence in the end. Many a well-to-do family, who set out with a nice sum of money, lost the whole of it on the other side of the ocean. He could not help here referring to the case of Henry Prizel, who went to London a few years before, with five hundred gold English sovereigns in his pocket, and set up a turner's shop, which, however, proved a complete failure, so that he died in utter misery, leaving his son Daniel in the workhouse.

To this Hermann observed that he knew Henry's case very well, since he was a far-off cousin of his own; but Henry's history could not justly be quoted as a specimen of wise emigration. His case entirely differed from that. To settle down in a European town as a tradesman was one thing, and to emigrate to America to become a farmer there was another. The two things, in fact, admitted of no comparison. As to Daniel, he was happy to be able to tell tolerably satisfactory news, for he had recently received a letter from him. He was not in the workhouse, but employed in a sugar-house near the Thames, where he earned a sovereign a week. It was hard work, and he was afraid his health would not be able to stand it. But he hoped that his cousin Hermann might find some employment for him in Germany, since he had not yet altogether forgotten the German language.

"How old was he when he left this country?" asked the minister.

"Twelve or thirteen, I think," answered Müller. "He cannot have been older than that."

"So he must be about twenty now," said the minister. "Why, Hermann, if your mind is made up to travel to America, you could easily take him along with you."

"No, no. You shall not go—you must not go," cried several voices; and again the conversation as to whether it was according to God's Word to leave one's country without urgent necessity, took a fresh start. The minister now expressed his opinion, and so did the schoolmaster. Many texts were quoted, and many sayings of wise, godly men, who had expressed themselves against what they called the emigration-fever, were called to remembrance.

The winter passed on, and spring came into the land, and Hermann's resolution was unchanged.

The whole village was astir on the day of the departure of the family. To the good people it was like a dismal funeral day. Every one who could spare a couple of hours followed the carts which conveyed the emigrants and their luggage to the station. There were the minister, and the schoolmaster, and the shoemaker, and the grocer, with their wives, and a great many other friends and neighbours, who surrounded the carts, shook hands with the departing ones on the road, and walked along, some weeping and some sobbing. And when they had seen them off with the train for Rotterdam, they returned home in deep silence, for their hearts were sad. It was to them as if they had carried a father and a brother to the grave.

According to an agreement made with a house at Cologne, the family proceeded to London to embark on board the "Borussia," a German emigrant-ship in which they had engaged berths as second-class passengers to New York. On their arrival they liked their accommodation well, and though they marvelled much at the innumerable multitude of big ships in the dock where theirs was lying, and were almost bewildered in the midst of the new and undreamt-of objects their eyes now beheld, they were yet glad to learn that they were to sail in two days, for they longed to reach their destination. Milwaukee, a Wisconsin town, on the western shore of Lake Michigan, was the point whither they had to travel, as Hermann's brother Dietrich was to meet them there with carts and horses to convey them to his house, which was about five days' journey further westward. Adjoining his farm were the acres he had bought for Hermann, who had sent him all the money he had realised from the sale of his farm stocking, save some forty pounds, which he had kept to pay travelling expenses from New York to Milwaukee. So everything being well arranged, as was thought, the good family had no other desire than to start as quickly as possible. This desire, however, was sadly frustrated. Owing to a defect which was discovered in the vessel, her departure was delayed for a week, in order that she might be repaired. Crowded with emigrants, and wedged in between numerous other vessels within the comparatively narrow space of a London dock, and with the vernal sun shining with unusual heat upon the deck, the cabins, and especially the second-class cabin, were actually turned into ovens. Our friends, who had been accustomed to breathe the pure, invigorating mountain-air of Germany, could not possibly stand this great and sudden change. Frau Stahl took ill, and so did three of the children. The doctor urgently advised Hermann to take lodgings during the days the ship was to be under repair, as he had no doubt change of air would soon put the invalids right again. Three rooms were accordingly taken for a week in the Commercial Road, but the doctor's expectation was not confirmed. The disease of Frau Stahl and the boys turned out to be scarlatina. When the ship was ready to sail, they could not possibly think of going with her, the less so that Hannah also took ill. Nothing was left for poor Hermann but to take his luggage out of the "Borussia," and allow her to sail without himself or family.

And now the position of the poor pilgrims became very trying indeed. Hitherto they had experienced no difficulty as to the language, since the captain, the doctor, the crew, and by far the greater portion of the passengers on board the "Borussia" were Germans. But the moment the ship was gone, poor Hermann found himself a stranger amongst people of whose language he did not understand one word The apartments which he had rented were good and well-furnished, but they cost a pound a week. The doctor, who came every day, sometimes twice a day, charged half-a-crown a visit. Provisions, too, were excessively dear in Hermann's opinion. Only think, sixteenpence, and even eighteenpence for a pound of butter (and such butter as he would have been ashamed to sell from his farm, and he used to sell his for eightpence or tenpence!) Beef, pork, and ham were double the price they were in his village! Rye bread—that dainty for a German palate—was not to be got in the whole of London! The dinner which his landlady cooked for him and the two boys who were not yet attacked by the disease, cost eighteenpence a day, and was scarcely eatable, as everything was cooked without salt, and the vegetables were like grass, and the potatoes like frozen turnips.

"My dear," he said one evening, after he had sat down by the bedside of his wife, who, as well as the other invalids, was progressing favourably, though every possible care had still to be taken to prevent relapses—"My dear," he said; "when it pleases the Lord to restore you and the children, we must leave these apartments and take cheaper ones."

"Dear husband, the Lord has indeed brought us into deep ways. I hope you don't lose your trust in Him."

"I do not, darling, but it is exceedingly difficult for me to get along with the people here, as I cannot understand them. I never felt so much alone in the world."

"Have you been to the hospital?"

This question of Frau Stahl's had reference to Daniel Prizel. On their arrival in London, Hermann had repaired to Daniel's address, as it was his intention to take him along with them to America. But the landlord told him that the young man had got the fever, and was lying in the hospital.

"I have not, dear," was the answer. "How could I have gone? I have not been away from you and the children since you took ill."

"Well, then, go now. Perhaps Daniel is sufficiently recovered to be able to help you through in this great Babel. He knows the ways and the language."

It was with great difficulty that Hermann found out Daniel's hospital, and it cost him not a little trouble to find Daniel after he had found the hospital. The young man was quite enraptured when the foreigner who approached his bed made himself known to him as his cousin Hermann Stahl from Kirchheim. He kissed him as a child kisses its father.

"So you have come at length!" exclaimed he. "And are you going to take me with you to America now? I am all but recovered, and if needs be I can go with you even as early as to-morrow."

Hermann told his story. An expression of deep grief clouded the beaming face of Daniel.

"But at any rate, the Cologne emigrant house will be bound to forward you to New York?" said he, in an interrogative tone.

"I think it will. I wrote to Cologne, but have got no answer as yet. It is their duty, of course; and surely they won't be so dishonest as to take advantage of our misfortunes."

THE GERMAN FAMILY IN LONDON.

Daniel sighed. He had not much confidence in the honesty of continental emigrant houses. "Most of them are swindlers," he muttered between his teeth.

"Could you come and see us this week, Daniel?"

"Of course, dear cousin. I shall be with you to-morrow."

"But we have scarlatina in the house."

"Never mind; I have had it. But you ought to be very careful with that disease. It is much more dangerous in this country than with us in Germany. Complaints may result from it such as we never hear of on the Continent."

The next day Daniel was sitting with his cousin in their front room. The poor lad was much emaciated and very weak. He had got the fever in the sugar-house, where he had to work all day in a temperature of from 100 to 110 degrees. He could not return to the works, as it would kill him. What he was to do now he knew not, and he had not so much as a farthing in his pocket.

"Of course you will stay with us," said Hermann. "Henceforth you are a member of the family. We will share weal and woe with each other. You will be of great service to me, as you know this terrible place and its terrible language."

"You find a great difference between this and Kirchheim I suppose?" said Daniel.

"I do indeed. I never could have thought that there was such a place in the world as this. People do not live here in their houses, but in omnibuses and railway carriages. The whole of this place is one huge mill, in which one is like to lose one's hearing and understanding from the constant buzz and whir."

As the patients were progressing favourably, it was resolved to look out for cheaper lodgings, for Hermann calculated that, if he went on in this way, he would be penniless within six weeks. Fortunately he had among his luggage, which was stowed away in a shed at the back of the house, a sufficient number of beds and mattresses, a complete cooking apparatus, and many other pieces of furniture. Daniel accordingly rented four unfurnished rooms on the first floor in a back street off the Commercial Road at twelve shillings a week. Chairs, tables, and bedsteads were bought at a low price at an auction in the neighbourhood, and when the invalids had recovered so far as to be capable of being removed without danger, the family went to the new abode.

Sunday came, and as none of the family were able to understand an English sermon, and the German Chapel was too far off, Hermann officiated as priest in his house, and conducted a regular service after the German fashion, by reading a sermon out of one of the collections with which the literature of his country is so well provided. He had brought several volumes of this kind in the expectation of using them in Wisconsin, where, as his brother had written, no church or chapel was to be seen for a score of miles round about. Service over, Hannah opened the door to step into the back room, which had been appropriated for a kitchen, when she started back with an exclamation of fright, as the passage and the stairs were crowded with people —men, women, and children.

Hermann and Daniel rushed at once to the doorway.

"What is all this about?" asked Daniel. "Is there anything the matter?"

"The singing, sir," cried some of the intruders. "Please give us another tune."

Indeed the singing of the family was worth hearing. Frau Stahl and Hannah had beautiful treble voices, Daniel sang a good tenor, Hermann's voice was a deep bass, which made the floor of the room quiver, and the boys took the alto part with faultless accuracy. And there was little to wonder at in this, for Master Peter Vormann, who was an excellent musician, had made the Kirchheim school famous for its singing, so that whenever there was a festival in the neighbourhood, and a chorus to be got up, the Kirchheim boys were always engaged for the alto part.

The unanimous request of this unexpected audience was gladly complied with. Another German hymn was sung, which the people listened to with breathless attention, and when Daniel at the close shut the door, the crowd dispersed, tendering loud applause.

"I see those savages are at least human beings," said Hermann. "They have a taste for our Deutschen Lieder."

"Savages!" cried Daniel, "let them not hear you speak in that way. They would soon do for you."

"Why, but they are savages," said Hermann; "they spend their days in nothing but drinking and fighting."

"Even the women here go to the public-house," said Hannah, "and stand at the bar 'dramming,' as they call it, with the men till they are drunk."

"Don't the women do the same in our country?" asked Daniel.

"I never saw a drunk woman in our country," answered Frau Stahl, in an indignant tone, "except pehaps on the occasion of some fair or popular festival; for a woman to frequent a public-house is a thing altogether unknown among us; such a one would be looked upon as a disgusting outcast by the whole population."

"The women also smoke in this country," said Johann, the eldest of the boys. "I saw an old yellow-faced woman the other day who looked exactly like a witch, as she smoked away from a small stump of a pipe not longer than my thumb. Ach! it looked hideous!"

"Ah! that must have been an Irishwoman or a gipsy," replied Daniel. "Englishwomen don't smoke; they hate it."

"Oh dear!" sighed Frau Stahl, "among what a set of people have we fallen! We have become like Israel in Babylon."

In the afternoon the family united for Bible-reading. The 34th Psalm was taken up for discussion.

"Shall we sing?" asked Hannah. "I am afraid we'll have a crowd again."

"Not likely," said Daniel, "the people are in the public-house now, or out for a walk, or taking a nap to sleep off the drink."

"Never mind the crowd," said Hermann. "Let them come again. Perhaps the Lord may touch their hearts through our lieder."

The beautiful psalm was read. Hermann had selected it to console himself and his family in their present distressing circumstances. There was some similarity, he observed, between their position and that of David at the time when he composed the psalm, since he found himself in the land of the Philistines, to which he had emigrated.

"True," remarked Frau Stahl, "and there is also this similarity between him and us, that he, like us, got into his difficulties through his imprudence, and through his not waiting upon the Lord. For if he had fully committed his lot to the hands of God, he would not have sought refuge with the heathen. So the Lord drove him away from that place, and compelled him to return to the land he had recklessly deserted. And the same course, I am afraid, the Lord is going to take with us now, for we have met with nothing but adversity since we left our good Kirchheim and our lovely farm, on which the Lord had blessed us for so many years."

It was rather in a desponding tone that Frau Stahl uttered these words. Nor was her reasoning altogether groundless. The members of the family had already several times discussed what course they should take, supposing the Cologne house refused to provide them with passages in another ship. It was evident that the money which they had still in hand would not last them longer than two months. Hermann had written to his brother Dietrich, requesting him to send back the money he had deposited with him, but it was uncertain whether that sum would come in time to prevent starvation. So it became more and more a matter of earnest consideration with them whether the wisest course would not be to return to Kirchheim before their last shilling was spent and they were left penniless in this immense metropolis. But the thought of returning poor and helpless to Kirchheim, of asking bread and shelter from those same friends who had so urgently dissuaded them from taking this step, was almost bitterer than the prospect of begging for their livelihood in the streets of London. So, whichever way they looked, they saw before them a dark cloud, and there was thus reason for the sad tone in which Frau Stahl—who, to tell the truth, had never been very strongly in favour of the emigration plan—made her observation. Her husband, however, perceiving that if courage and hope were lost everything would be lost, and feeling his responsibility as the head and support of the family, encouraged himself in God, as David did when the town of Ziklag was burnt.

"Dear wife," he said, "I think you are right in pointing to the present as days of deep humiliation for us. Perhaps we did not earnestly seek the Lord's face before resolving to quit our land. Perhaps also we have sinned in some other way, so that the chastening hand of God is now heavy upon us. But we should remember that David, though he had brought difficulties upon himself by his imprudence, yet continued to trust in God, knowing that the Lord would not forsake him on account of his transgressions. 'Many are the afflictions of the righteous,' he says, 'but the Lord delivereth him out of them all.' Let us walk in that same faith now. If God chooses to deal with us according to our sins, we have nothing to hope. But Jesus died for us, and bore our sins in his precious body on the tree. We will plead on that ground, my dears, and firmly believe that, though we may have erred, yet our Heavenly Father, who bought us at a price, will not forsake us. He never said to us that He will only be our God provided we sin no more. We are living in the day of grace, and the fountain that was opened against every pollution on Calvary is flowing still as abundantly as ever."

While the poor pilgrims were in this way refreshing their souls at the waters of consolation that flow from the Word of God, a terrible shuffling, crying, and screaming were heard over their heads. Then there was a bounce on the floor, as if some heavy body were falling, followed by the cry "Murder!" Hermann and Daniel rushed up the stairs, and stepped into the room whence the noise issued. A strange sight was presented to their view. Their neighbour, who was a carman, was standing over his wife with an uplifted pewter-pot in his hand; he had knocked her down and was beating her unmercifully; a table had been upset in the struggle, and behind it two little children were cowering and crying piteously. Hermann threw himself between the two. To wrench the pewter-pot from the drunk man's hand, to drag him away from his victim, and raise up the poor woman who was bleeding profusely from the head, was the work of a moment. Frau Stahl, on her husband's calling out for her, came up with a basin of water and a sponge, and washed the poor woman's head, which, though badly cut, yet showed no dangerous wounds. Hannah took the two children, while Hermann and Daniel replaced the table on its legs. During these proceedings the perpetrator of all this mischief, whom Hermann had pushed down on a chair, fell asleep, and snored away like a Turk.

"Thank God, he sleeps," said the woman, "and he will sleep on now till to-morrow morning; and when he awakes he will remember nothing of all that has happened, and be as soft and meek as a lamb. Oh, that cursed drink! but for that he would be such a good husband!"

When the family was assembled in their own room again, Frau Stahl fell into a fit, and Hannah burst into tears. Such a scene was too much for the tender nerves of the good women of Kirchheim.

Meanwhile the circumstances of the family became more and more straitened. The answer from the Cologne house, which at length arrived, was altogether unfavourable. "The Company," the letter said, "had made no other contract with Mr. Stahl than to send him and his family to New York by the 'Borussia.' The Company were surprised at learning that Mr. Stahl and family had left that ship in London. Mr. Stahl, the Company admitted, was perfectly at liberty to do so, but he ought to have known that by this action he had forfeited any further claims upon the Company, since there were no stipulations made in the contract by which the Company were obliged to provide him and his family with another ship."

After the receipt of this letter, the question what course to take was again discussed,—whether they should return to Kirchheim, or stay and wait for the letter from brother Dietrich? The family held a special prayer-meeting for the purpose of asking Divine guidance in this important matter. At length they resolved to remain, since their property was in America, and London was at any rate nearer to that than Kirchheim, where they had no business at all, and nothing but poverty could be their lot. But as the money which was in Hermann's possession was fast dwindling away, they quitted their lodgings and rented instead two large rooms in a court at eight shillings per week.

Fortunately the people who inhabited this court were not of the worst kind. With the exception of one disreputable house, nothing offensive to decency was to be seen in it. The houses were mostly occupied by working-men, costermongers, pedlars, &c. Frau Stahl kept the children as much in the house as she could; and Daniel spent a great portion of his time in teaching them English, writing, and the elements of arithmetic, &c. At these lessons Hermann was also often present, as he deemed it wise to learn as much as he could of the "terrible language."

One day Johann, who had been out on an errand, came home with a black eye, and all bespattered with mud. The whole family was in alarm. After having been cleaned and washed, and refreshed by a warm cup of coffee, Johann told his story. On returning from his errand, he found the entrance of the court blocked up by a crowd of people standing in a circle round two lads who were fighting. It was evident that the one, a boy of scarcely fifteen, was not at all a match for his antagonist, a big lad of seventeen; consequently the former was being beaten unmercifully, the blood running from his nose. As none of the bystanders seemed disposed to interfere, Johann stepped between the pugilists and tried to separate them. A stout lad of his own age and stature at once came forward, and in a provoking tone asked him what right he had to interfere. In his broken English he answered, "Because little boy too little for big boy." The stout lad then uttered a volley of words which Johann did not understand, and clenching his fists, placed himself in a fighting attitude.

"No, not fight," said Johann.

"Why not, you coward? fight!" cried the bystanders, who now formed a circle round them.

"No, not fight," said Johann. "Christians no fight."

"Take that, you Christian," cried the lad, and at the same moment Johann felt the lad's fist come down with great force on his eye. Now Johann was an extraordinarily strong lad, whose muscles were powerfully developed by the invigorating German mountain air, and who was reckoned an adept in the Turn Uebungen—i.e., the gymnastical exercises, which in Prussia form a considerable part of the popular school training. Before his antagonist could launch a second blow he caught him by the waist, lifted him up from the ground and threw him down. Then throwing himself upon him, he kept him under till after some fruitless struggling he promised not to renew the affray. Johann then let him go, and stepped home amidst the loud applause of the crowd, some of whom tried to force him into a public-house to receive a glass of beer as a token of their admiration. It was with difficulty he escaped from them.

From that day Johann went in the court by the name of "the Christian."

"Well, those foreigners over there are better folks than the whole lot of us," said Mrs. Harding, the pedlar's wife, who was standing chatting with another woman in the doorway of her house.

"Ay, what you say is quite true," said Mrs. Field, the mason's wife, who lived in a room over Hermann's. "They are religious people. They sing and pray twice every Sunday, and every morning and evening in the week."

"What in all the world may those people's business be?" asked Mary Prescott, the cobbler's daughter. "They seem to have no trade. The old man is always at home, and I never see his wife and daughter in the street, except for a walk or an errand."

"Oh, I know," said Mrs. Harding. "One of them, a nice young man of twenty or so, told me the other day that they were on their way to America, but had been detained by fever and were waiting for a letter."

"Poor folks; they seem to be hard up," said Mary Prescott. "I saw that young man at the pawnbroker's a couple of days ago."

"Why, they haven't a stick of furniture left, scarcely," observed Mrs. Field. "Yesterday I happened to pass their room when the door was standing open. A blind horse couldn't do much harm there."

Indeed, the description was not exaggerated. The Germans were now reduced to a state of complete poverty. Hermann had tried every day to obtain some employment, but his total ignorance of the language had frustrated all his attempts. At length Daniel found some work with a turner, for which he got ten shillings a week. He paid his wages faithfully into the hands of Frau Stahl. It was upon his labour indeed that the family were living for the present. How eagerly did they look out for a letter from brother Dietrich every day! But in vain. Every day Hermann returned with empty hands from the Post Office. Poor fellow, he was often in low spirits.

"My dear," said his wife, who perceived that now it was her turn to lay hold of the anchor of faith—"My dear," said she, one evening after they had finished their scanty supper, "let us not lose sight of our blessed Lord. He is here with us now, though we cannot see Him. He knows all our wants."

"Oh, blessed Jesus! come and console us;" ejaculated Hannah. "Thou hast suffered so much for us; Thou knowest what suffering is."

"Father, let us sing that hymn of Paul Gerhardt's: 'Commit your ways to Jesus,'" said one of the boys.

"Are you not too hungry to sing, Bernhard?" asked Hermann, in a melancholy voice, stroking the boy's hair. "Oh, what a grief! And it is all my fault. How could I be so foolish as to take you out of our lovely Kirchheim, to plunge you into this dark pit! The Lord knows I am willing to suffer ten times over for it, but to see you suffer for my sins—it will break my heart."

But Hannah raised the tune, and the others joined in with cheerful voices, and Hermann could not help seconding with his deep bass, sad as his heart was.

While they were singing, a knock was heard at the door, and in stepped Bob Harding, the pedlar. He had a large pie in his hand.

"Is this Christian's?" he asked.

"Yes, we Christians," answered Hermann. "And I hope you one, too, good friend."

"He means Johann," said Daniel in German to Hermann.

"Are you that fine fellow who took my son's part the other day?" said the pedlar to Daniel.

"No, I am not; it was him," said Daniel, pointing to Johann.

"I brought this mutton pie for you," said he, placing the pie before Johann. "And my wife's and Henry's compliments, sir. You did well. I was away in the country a-hawking, but on coming home yesterday I learnt what had happened last week. I hope you will not refuse to accept this small present, sir; it is not much, but we are poor people. I wish I could do more."

The simple-hearted candid tone in which the pedlar uttered these words, and his thoroughly honest though rough-looking face, made a very agreeable impression upon the company.

"This is an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile," said Hermann to his wife. Then turning to Harding, he tendered him his hand: "I tank you," said he; "sit yourself, sir."

The pedlar seated himself upon the chair which one of the boys offered him.

Hermann then, in broken English, endeavoured to speak to him on the subject ever uppermost in his mind—the love of God in Jesus Christ.

"Are you not Germans?" asked Harding, after a while.

"We are."

"I think you would like to make the acquaintance of Mr. Wasserman; or do you already know him?"

"I do not. Who is he?"

"Why, he is the German missionary to the sailors in the docks. He is a very nice man, Mr. Wasserman is. I will send him to you. Hoping you will like the pie, I must bid you good evening, sir."

The pedlar's hope was fully realized. He could scarcely have reached his house before each member of the family had a piece of the pie between thumb and fingers. Hermann pronounced a blessing, and when the welcome refreshment had disappeared, the beautiful hymn, "Now thank ye all the Lord," echoed through the room.

This was a sweet drop in the bitter cup of affliction. Hermann made the observation that the inhabitants of this "terrible place" with its "terrible language," were not all savages. Frau Stahl added that she had no doubt but the Lord had much people in this great city.

Next day the post brought a letter from Kirchheim enclosing one from brother Dietrich. He asked in a tone of alarm how it was that they had not come with the "Borussia." It was obvious from the date of his letter that he had never received theirs. This was a fresh blow to the hopes of the poor family. It was now certain that they need not expect any money from America; and the last article they could dispose of was pawned. What were they to do?

They spent the evening in prayer, without, however, forgetting the Deutschen Lieder.

"My dears," said Hermann, "as long as there is a Saviour in heaven there is reason for us to sing."

The next morning Hermann went out for a walk. About noon he came back.

"I have found work," he said. "A pound a week."

"Is it true?" cried Frau Stahl, joyfully. "And where?"

"At the sugar-house. I begin to-morrow morning."

Frau Stahl burst into tears, and so did the children. They knew from Daniel's description what it was to work in the sugar-house.

"You shall not go there!" cried she. "Will you add to our affliction by making me a widow and these poor children orphans?"

"Dear wife, the Lord will be my strength. He will sustain me, knowing what I shall be labouring for."

During that day there was a continuous struggle of love between the father and his family: the one arguing that it was his duty even to lay down his life for them if necessary; the others insisting that it was his duty to spare his life as much as he could.

The sun had just set, and Hannah had scarcely lit the thin candle which cast a gloomy light through the room, when a knock was heard at the door. The pedlar made his appearance, accompanied by a stranger, whom he introduced as Mr. Wasserman.

"Oh! Ein Deutscher Bruder!" cried the family, simultaneously.

"I go," whispered the pedlar into Johann's ear, "as I don't understand your gibberish." While uttering these words he slipped half-a-crown into the lad's hand.

A most agreeable conversation took place between the family and Mr. Wasserman, who proved to be a truly good man. Something for supper was bought with Bob's half-crown, of which Mr. Wasserman was kind enough to partake. Many a dear German hymn was sung, and Mr. Wasserman gladly stayed to have worship with his friends. He told them that he was employed as a missionary by a company of six wealthy shipowners, two of whom were Germans. He advised Hermann not to go to the sugar-house the next day, but to call upon him.

The next morning Hermann, accompanied by the missionary, found himself in the office of Messrs. Krübner, Bären & Co. Mr. Krübner received him very kindly, and listened attentively to his story.

"If what you say be true," he observed, "we certainly must try to help you. Meanwhile I will write to the clergyman of Kirchheim to obtain information." Then looking at Hermann, whose honest open countenance pleased him well, he added: "We have a meeting to-night in our school-room. If you like to attend with your wife and children I will give you tickets."

"Is it a German meeting?" asked Hermann.

"No, it is in an English Church; but you will be able to pick up enough to make you enjoy it."

The whole family was that evening in the large school-room of —— Church. There was tea first, during which the merry chat of the crowded assembly buzzed cheerfully through the room. Then there were addresses by several speakers, and hymns and prayers. Though Hermann and his wife understood but little of what was said, yet their hearts leaped for joy at the sight.

"What a pleasant evening!" he said when at home again. "It was just such a meeting as we used to have at Barmen, except for the open air."

"You see," said his wife, "it is just as I told you the other day. All the people of this place are not savages. The Lord has many children here, depend upon it, Hermann."

A fortnight later, on a bright Autumn morning, the "Atlantic," a large merchant ship belonging to the firm of Messrs. Krübner Bären & Co., weighed anchor for New York. The captain was a German, and for the first time in his life had passengers on board, as he had not been in the habit of conveying anything save goods. He was glad to receive our friends, however, for he was a good man, and he knew that they were looking out for even a better country than they were going to start for now.

"Good-bye, dear friends," said Mr. Krübner, shaking hands with Hermann when the signal for departure was given. "May the Lord carry you safely to your destination."

While uttering these words he handed an envelope to Hermann, and disappeared. It contained a fifty-pound note, and inside was written, "For the journey to Wisconsin."

The last intelligence received in London by way of Kirchheim was that the family were doing exceedingly well, that their house was all but built, and that they did not know how to thank and praise the Lord enough for his unspeakable goodness.

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

IX.—GOD'S ABILITY.

WERE we to judge of the matter by the conduct of many, we should conclude it to be by no means a difficult thing to be a Christian. They seem to think it almost as easy to wash one's heart as their hands; to change their habits as their dress; to admit the light of Divine truth into the soul as the morning into our chamber by opening the shutters;—in short, that it is not more difficult to turn the heart from evil to good, from the world to God, and from sin to Christ, than to turn a ship right round by help of her helm.

How else can we account for many, otherwise sensible people, putting off their salvation to a time confessedly unsuitable for any arduous task whatever—till, reduced to a state of mental and physical prostration, they lie languishing on a bed of sickness, or tossing on a bed of death? It ought to be an easy work that is deferred till then: yet what a sad mistake is this? An easy work to be a Christian!—as if the life required of those who go to heaven were in such harmony with our natural feelings that it was like being borne along on the surface of a placid stream. "Take now thy son, thy only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt-offering on a mountain which I will tell thee of," was the command God laid on Abraham, the trial to which he put his servant's faith; and how did its every sentence quiver like an arrow, go like a knife into the old man's heart? Was it easy for a father to brace up his nerves to such a deed; to look on the beloved youth, the innocent and unsuspecting victim, for those three dreadful days they travelled together to the fatal spot; to lay the wood on Isaac that, kindled by a father's hand, was to consume his son to ashes; to meet that natural but terrible question, "My father, behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering?" And when the fell purpose could be concealed no longer, and the dreaded hour at length had come when Abraham must raise the veil, was it easy to look on Isaac's horror and resist his entreaties, and hear his agonizing cries? or even witness his resignation as, moved by his father's grief, and pitying him more than himself, he stretched his body on the altar, saying, Father, not my will, but thine be done? And when with trembling hands the old man wound the cords around his limbs, and felt them tremble, had it not been easier to be the child than the father, the victim than the priest at such a sacrifice? One stroke of the knife, and Isaac's woes are past; but if he does not rise like a phœnix from his ashes, what a return to his home awaits Abraham! what a meeting with the mother! what a future to the poor old man! His heart is broken, and his grey hairs go down with sorrow to the grave.

Never again may love to God be put to such a test, or faith in his promises have such a trial to endure. Still it is no easy thing to be a Christian; and, if words have any meaning, they are great and painful sacrifices which are required of those who are willing to take Christ on his own terms, "If any man will come after me let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me"—"If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell." God does not indeed put all his people to such a trial as Abraham's, saying "Take now thy son, and offer him for a burnt offering," nor does Christ lay on all his disciples an injunction so hard as this, "Go, sell all thou hast, and give it to the poor." Still the adage holds true as ever, No cross, no crown! To mortify the lusts of the flesh, to be crucified to the world, to overcome the devil, to die daily to sin and live daily to righteousness, to be meek and gentle and patient and generous and kind and good, in one word to be Christ-like, is a work beyond, far beyond our ability; one we should never venture on, or having ventured on, would soon abandon, but that God promises to perfect his strength in our weakness, and is "mighty to save."

Now the best evidence we have of what God can and will do is what he has already done. This was the source of Moses' confidence when he left the land of Midian to conquer the power of Egypt, and bring Israel out of the house of bondage. Behold, he said to God, when first called to undertake the task—behold the people will not believe that I am able to deliver them. "What is that in thine hand?" said the voice from amidst the burning bush. A rod, was his reply. "Cast it on the ground," said the voice. He did it; and springs back with sudden terror—surprise, fear, horror in his countenance, for there a serpent with head erect, and eyes of fire, and cleft quivering tongue, is hissing at him. Once more the voice sounds out from the bush, "Put forth thine hand, and take it by the tail." Recovering from his panic, he boldly seizes the writhing reptile; and now its cold, scaly form is no sooner within his grasp than, like many things else which become harmless in the hand of faith, the venomed creature stiffens into a shepherd's rod. His confidence established on a firm foundation, Moses hesitates no longer. Entrusting his wife and children to her father's care, and leaving others to feed his flocks on the hills of Midian, he enters boldly on his mission. Repairing to his countrymen he tells them his errand. The rod is his credentials. It shall speak for him. Assured that what God has once done he can do again, he bids them look. His answer to such as question or doubt his authority is a shepherd's rod, which, flung from his hand, no sooner touches the ground, than it changes to a living serpent.

And though man has no inherent power to sanctify any more than to save himself, even, according to the words of the apostle, to think one good thought, let us, with Moses, David, and the saints of old, remember the years of the right hand of the Most High. See what, for such great and gracious purposes, God has done for others, and thus learn what he can and will do for us!

Take two instances. Look at the thief on the cross. It is from the very edge of the pit, just as he is going over, that the mighty hand of Jesus plucks him. Who that heard that robber with his fellow and the base crowd insult a dying Saviour, who that saw him nailed to his cross, a daring, despairing, hardened ruffian, could have believed it possible that a few hours thereafter he would be singing songs in Paradise? Yet the sun of that day had not set behind Judah's hills ere a blaspheming wretch ripe for hell was converted, saved, and sanctified; and had taken his flight to heaven to tell to listening angels what mercy had done for him—how Christ had saved him at the uttermost. Look also at Paul. The old bed of the sea laid bare for the foot of Israel, the dry rock changed into a gushing fountain, the rotting tenant of the tomb rising at Christ's word, to appear, once divested of the grave-clothes, with life sparkling in his eye and health blooming on his rosy cheek, did not attest God's power over dead matter more plainly than Paul's conversion attests his power over a depraved heart. What more incredible than that yonder man who, with a fierceness, a firmness of purpose, and an intensity of hatred uncommon to the ingenuous years of youth, stands glutting his eyes with Stephen's blood, would ere long be Christ's greatest and most devoted apostle; and would die, after a life of unparalleled sufferings, a martyr in the very cause for which he sheds the first martyr's blood? Yet so it was. Is anything too hard for me? saith the Lord; in other and fuller words—is any heart too hard for me to break; any sin too great for me to pardon; any passions too strong for me to bind; any habits too old for me to change; any prayer too great for me to answer; or any wants too many for me to supply? The blessed lesson such cases teach us is this, that however great the difficulties, or deep the sorrows, or strong the temptations, or arduous the duties of his people, his grace, as he promises, shall be sufficient for them. And so they may use the highest and yet the humblest, the bravest though by no means boastful saying that ever fell from mortal lips—"I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me."

Such is the help which his people have in their God; and this furnishes the key to the strange paradox of Paul, "When I am weak, then am I strong"—in other, and apparently self-contradictory words, when I am weak then I am not weak; when I am not strong, then I am strong. Peter's history, and that of many others besides, supplies a remarkable illustration of the reverse proposition, this namely, When I am strong, then am I weak. Let us look at it. So strong was Simon in his own vain judgment that in place of waiting till Christ invited him to walk on the water, he volunteered to make the bold attempt. Addressing his Master as, stepping with Godlike majesty from billow to billow, he approached their boat, Peter said, "Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee on the water." To drown not him but his vanity, and mortify the conceit and presumption which was his besetting sin, our Lord acceded to Peter's request, saying, Come. The permission is no sooner granted than, probably without a prayer for Divine help, and certainly with more rashness than genuine courage, he leaps from the boat. The water bears him up: he walks the rolling billows—yet, ere he rejoins his companions, how effectually is he taught that when a man is strong, then he is weak? He began to build without counting the cost; and the only result is a house which, unfinished and unfurnished, remains the inglorious monument of his pride and poverty. Its terrors increased by the gloom of night, the storm raves and roars, and the waves rushing on with foaming crests threaten to engulf him, and avenge themselves on the puny mortal who has dared to defy their power. His situation is novel and alarming. A panic seizes him; his courage melts like a snowflake on the water; he feels the waves opening beneath his feet; he sinks, deeper and deeper sinks, till this rash adventurer, who would walk the sea, the rival of his Master and the envy of his fellows, raises his drowning head to throw out his arms and cry, Lord, save me! As has often happened where there was more than life at stake, and in scenes less picturesque, or public, Jesus hastes to the rescue—"a refuge and strength, a very present help in time of trouble;" and, upheld by the arm that upholds the universe, Peter is borne back to his companions, who receive him into the boat, pale, half-drowned, trembling with abject terror—a warning and very memorable illustration of the saying, "Pride goeth before a fall."

For a contrast look at Moses—the feelings with which he undertook, and the manner in which he executed his commission to deliver Israel from Pharaoh and the house of bondage. What a remarkable and happy contrast his case to Peter's! Strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, he forced his way into the palace, and bore himself before the king with undaunted courage—demanding the liberties of his countrymen. Single-handed and alone he stuck by his purpose, and carried it over what seemed insuperable difficulties. Without arms he undertook to conquer armies; to cross the sea without ships; and in a journey extending over many years, to carry a mighty host safely through a desert where there was neither water to quench their thirst, nor bread to satisfy their hunger. All this, and much more than this, Moses did; nor closed his eyes in death till he saw the longest, grandest march men ever made brought to a triumphant issue on the borders of the Promised Land. But Peter's enterprise and his were not more different in their conclusion than in their commencement. Self-confident, rash, vain, impulsive, the fisherman of Galilee rushed on the perils of the deep; while Moses, a man more highly endowed by nature and cultivated by education, shrunk from the task assigned him; declined the post of honour; and, overwhelmed by a sense of his own weakness and inadequacy, even remonstrated with God, saying, "Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh?" Nor till the Lord's anger was actually kindled against him, as he stood there starting one objection after another, did he venture to undertake the task. He went to it, not in his own strength, but in the might of God. To him he looked for counsel and courage, for faith, patience, and success. And He who did not fail Moses, will never fail any that put their trust in him. The salvation of the righteous is of the Lord; He is their strength in the time of trouble; the Lord shall help them and deliver them, and save them because they trust in Him. Therefore with the courage they may lift up the battle song of Martin Luther, and in words which cheered the hearts and sustained the arms of Germany in the good fight of the Reformation, sing:—

A sure stronghold our God is he,
A trusty shield and weapon,
Our help he'll be, and set us free
From every ill can happen.
That old malicious foe
Intends us deadly woe;
Armed with the strength of hell,
And deepest craft as well,
On earth is not his fellow.

Through our own force we nothing can,
Straight were we lost for ever;
But for us fights the proper Man,
By God sent to deliver.
Ask ye who this may be?
Christ Jesus named is he,
Of Sabaoth the Lord;
Sole God to be adored;
'Tis he must win the battle.

And were the world with devils filled,
All eager to devour us,
Our souls to fear should little yield,
They cannot overpower us.
Their dreaded prince no more
Can harm us as of yore;
Look grim as e'er he may,
Doom'd is his ancient sway,
A word can overthrow him.

Our confidence in God's ability to save and help us, the bold prayer of faith, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O arm of the Lord; awake as in the ancient days, in the days of old," rests on this sure foundation, that God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Moses, when he led Israel out of Egypt,—their house of bondage, had reached the fourscore years that David says prove to the few who attain such an age but labour and sorrow. For forty years thereafter he guides their wanderings through the desert, till, way-worn and weary, they reach the welcome borders of the Promised Land. They are to enter it; but not he, though ere his eyes close in death he is to see it. For this purpose he is directed to climb the heights of Pisgah—a lofty mountain in Moab, whose top affords the spectator a wide though distant view of Palestine. But should our imaginations picture Moses as an aged man, stooping under the weight of years as, with many a breathing pause, he slowly takes his way up the steep, till, arrived at the summit, he falls exhausted on the ground or leans panting on his staff, and, while the mountain-breeze plays with his thin grey locks, strains his old eyes on the valleys of Canaan that stretch away to the horizon beyond the silver line of Jordan and gloomy waters of the Dead Sea, should we imagine this, our fancy were wide of the mark. Moses was now one hundred and twenty years old; yet he climbed the heights and stood on the top of Pisgah, with an eye as bright, an arm as strong, a foot as fleet, a bearing as erect and manly as when, forty years before, he bearded the lion in his den—the tyrant in his palace, and, boldly stepping into Pharaoh's hall, said, "Thus saith the Lord . . . Let my people go!" In the words of the wondrous story, "his eye was not dim, neither was his natural strength abated."

But in this Moses presented a singular exception to the common fate of men. A few years, and cares and sorrows write their wrinkles on man's brow; time sheds its snows on raven locks; the wheels of life get clogged with growing infirmities; manly strength turns into weakness, and wisdom perhaps into the drivelling of second childhood. And even where the power men possessed was, as it must necessarily have been in Moses' case, preternatural and miraculous, still the old adage holds true—"Times change, and we change with them."

Take these two examples in illustration of that remark. First, the case of Samson, whose great strength saved his country from oppression, and struck terror into the boldest of its enemies. A lion meets him, and taking it by the jaws, he rends it, like a young kid, asunder: sure of their prey, they shut him up in Gaza, and he wrenches off its ponderous gates, and, bearing them to a neighbouring hill top, laughs his enemies to scorn: catching him at a disadvantage, the Philistines beset him, and, for lack of sword or battle-axe, seizing a jaw-bone that lies to his hand, he throws himself on their serried ranks, and, cutting down a man at every blow, leaves a thousand dead on the field. Yet see—his long locks lying on Delilah's floor, and the harlot that betrayed him counting her ill-earned gains—Samson is led away bound, the laughing-stock of women and children. Now a poor, blinded prisoner making sport to the Philistines, how are the mighty fallen!—his hand is shortened that it cannot save. Then, for a second example, look at the disciples. On descending from the Mount of Transfiguration, our Lord finds them surrounded by an agitated crowd, who regard them with conflicting feelings; some with wonder, some with pity, some with sneering contempt. Endowed by their Master with miraculous powers, they had aforetime put them forth with success, and triumphed on many fields—they had opened the eyes of the blind; at their bidding dumb lips had spoken, the deaf had heard, wan, withered limbs had been restored to use; and without David's harp, or other charm than their great Master's name, they had dispossessed men of demons, and driven the foul fiends away. But now Jesus finds them humbled, mortified, put to shame before a crowd of on-lookers. A father, whose ears their fame had reached and whose heart it had inspired with hope, brings to them his son—sore vexed with a devil. But it is to be bitterly disappointed. One after another, they try each holy art; but in vain. They name the name of Jesus. It avails not; and hope sinks in the father's heart as his son sinks yelling, foaming, convulsed and contorted at his feet. Like Samson when his hair was shorn, the disciples are as other men; their hand has lost its cunning—it is shortened that it cannot save. But, blessed be his name, it is never so with our God. What He has done, he can do again. So they that trust in the Lord shall never be put to shame—their security for that standing in the very nature of God. He is unchanging and unchangeable. "I am the Lord," he says, "I am the Lord. I change not."

With what confidence, therefore, may we cast our burdens on him whose mercy endureth for ever, whose grace faileth never. It is not with him as it may be with other monarchs, other pastors, and other parents. There are monarchs whose dominions are more extensive than they can govern with advantage either to their subjects or to themselves—the influence of authority and of justice diminishing with distance, like that of the heart which, in persons of giant stature, as the slow circulation indicates, is always feeble at the extremities. There are ministers also in charge of flocks much more numerous than they can properly attend to; who, however conscientiously and diligently they labour to leave none neglected, find it as impossible to overtake all their duties as a man, let him run as he may, to overtake the horizon, which flies before him. Then there are many fathers who have more children than in hard times and circumstances they find it easy, or almost possible to support. Uncared for by thousands who fare sumptuously, and millions who fare comfortably, every day, there are sad homes in this world, where abject poverty curdles up the natural affections; and, leaving one mouth less to fill, the death of a child is regarded rather as the removal of a burden than the loss of a blessing. The ability of the wretched parents to support their offspring falls so far short at any rate of their wishes, it needs such a struggle to keep body and soul together, that the poor infant is not always welcomed into the world; and I have stood in bare, cold, unfurnished houses where no passage of Scripture could sound stranger in mortal ears than these beautiful words in theirs: "Thy children shall be like olive plants round about thy table. As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man, so are children of the youth. Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them."

Such melancholy spectacles, when saddest and most painful, have their uses. By way of contrast they set forth to the comfort of his believing people the ability that is in their God, even as the dull foil sets off the gem, and a murky storm-cloud the bow that spans it. For just as one day is with God as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day, it is the same to his infinite love, and power, and wisdom, and mercy, whether the objects of his care be one, or one thousand; or, as is actually the case with the redeemed of God, a great company which no man can number. This is a lesson, for there are

> Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
> Sermons in stones, and good in everything which we may read on the page of nature. Myriads of leaves clothe the forest, myriads of flowers bespangle the meadow, myriads of insects dance in the sunbeams, myriads of birds sing in the woodlands, myriads of fish swim in stream and ocean, myriads of stars glitter in the nightly sky, and every leaf is as perfect in form, every flower as beautiful in colours, every living creature fashioned with such skill, and every burning star guided through space with as much care, as if it engrossed the entire attention of God, and there was not another but itself within the bounds of his universe. The number of objects our hearts can hold, or our arms embrace, or our eyes watch, or our fortunes enrich, or our bounty pension, is limited ; confined within a narrow range, is small at the largest and few at the most. It is not so with Him who is mighty to save, abundant in goodness and truth. The supplies of his grace and mercy are unexhausted and exhaustless. Their type shines in that sun which for six thousand years has shed its light on seas and continents, on crowded cities and lonely solitudes, on burning deserts and fields of ice, on palaces and cottages, on ragged beggars and sceptred kings, on all countries and classes of men, and with fires fed we know not how, shines to-day as bright as ever—his eye not dim, nor his natural strength abated. And as this is but an image, and a faint image, of God, well may his servant assure us, there shall be no want to them that fear him. None —neither for the body nor the soul : neither for time nor eternity. Let us come boldly to the throne of grace. We cannot go to Him too often, nor ask of him too much. We have no sin but he has a pardon for it ; no sore, but he has salve for it ; no weakness, but he has strength for it; no cankering care, but he has relief for it ; no grievous sorrow, but he has comfort for it ; no bleeding heart-wound, but he has balm to soothe and a bandage to bind it up. It is impossible for us to expect too much from his generosity, or trust too implicitly to the bounties of his providence and the aids of his Spirit. It is equally easy for God to supply our greatest as our smallest wants, to carry our heaviest as our lightest burden—just as it is as easy for the great ocean to bear on her bosom a ship of war with all its guns and crew aboard, as a fisherman's boat or the tiniest craft that floats, falling and rising on her swell. In the most desperate cases of sinners and in the darkest circumstances of saints, "when all power is gone" and there seems no outget or deliverance, God is mighty to save. Confident in his resources, he says, Is anything too hard for me?—Prove me herewith, if I will not open the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing till there is no room to contain—Who is he that feareth the Lord and obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness and hath no light, let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay himself on his God.

THE ROSE OF CHERITON: A BALLAD.

BY MRS. SEWELL.

The autumn day was closing, cool and dry ;
The sun was setting in a cloudless sky,
Flinging around him, as he sunk to rest,
A crimson glory, flushing east and west.
The quiet landscape caught his bright farewell,
Ere the deep shadows of the evening fell.
The gliding river, and the broken sedge,
The pollard willows by the water's edge,
Smiled for a moment in the passing gleam ;
Then sighed the sedge, and darker flowed the stream.
While cottage windows flashed into a blaze,
And meadow pathways lay in purple haze ;
A sudden glory touched the whirling mill ;
More crimson glowed the heather on the hill,
And starting up beneath the pinewood shade,
A moment, stood a golden colonnade ;
Then dropt the sun, the vision died away,
And twilight followed in her sober grey.

I wandered on, the paths were dry and fair,
A mellow freshness breathed upon the air ;
And from the busy harbour, far away,
Came sounds unheeded in the light of day ;
Then intervals of silence—calm, profound—
Mysterious harmony, unlinked to sound,
Which all my thoughts in tranquil musing bound.

How many men, in ages long gone by,
Had walked at eve across these uplands dry--
Had sowed their seed, and left it on the plain,
Perchance to bear a crop of precious grain,
Or, planted carelessly the noxious weed,
To scatter, year by year, its baleful seed—
To seed, and grow, and seed, and still grow on,
Till the last sowing time has come and gone—
Till the great harvest, gathered in complete,
Shall stand in light before the judgment seat,
With every item in its full amount
All duly noted to the right account ;
When every startled labourer shall own
The abundant crop his little seed has sown—
His work, emblazoned through eternal days ;
Remorse eternal, or eternal praise.

While musing thus, the narrow pathway crept
From field to field, then dropped into the cleft
Of a deep lane, o'erhung with old ash-trees,
That trembled slightly in the evening breeze.
Well pleased I followed, careless where it led ;
Still lingered in the west a streak of red ;
The moon would rise, and by her friendly ray
A stranger's foot could hardly miss the way.

But what was this ? for now a sudden turn
Revealed a dwelling-house—so cold and stern,
So dull and desolate, so grim and bare,
A curious fascination held me there.
Farm-house it seemed, slow wearing to decay,
Bearing the impress of a better day.
The door moved slightly with a creaking sound,
That woke no echo in the silence round.
The casement flapped anon, then stood ajar ;
No hand came forth to draw the sliding bar,
Nor turn aside the rambling rose that strayed
Across the window, deepening the shade.
The mossy road that swept round to the door,
No trace of wheel upon its surface bore ;
No dint of hoof or footprint might declare
That guest or master ever entered there.

Deserted ant-hills, and the heaving mound
That marked the mole's dark passage in the ground,
Deformed the grass-plot, now, as coarse and rank
As ragged turf upon a wayside bank;
The border where the flowers had grown was bare,
Saving a hardy straggler here and there,
Or enterprising bud, resolved to peep
Through matted leaves that rotted rich and deep.

As thus I gazed, the air was gently stirred
By the light flutter of a wakeful bird;
And on the casement, where the roses hung,
A robin perched itself and sweetly sung.
Clear rose the little songster's trilling strain,
But no sweet voice sent answer back again.
A lonely bat kept wheeling round and round,
Making its circuit of the garden ground.
What could they tell? What were the ancient ties
That bound them here by faithful memories?
What had they seen? Did little footsteps pass
Along this road, or run across this grass?
Did happy mother plant these lingering flowers,
With children round her, in the sweet spring hours?
Had they been driven forth, or passed away?
What hand had sown this harvest of decay?
There was the roofless barn; its silent floor
Resounded to the thresher's flail no more;
And there the stable—rack and manger gone;
And time-worn sheds with thick moss overgrown.
I stood and pondered, till my watchful ear
Caught the long stride of footsteps drawing near.

"Good evening, sir! You're looking at the place;
All that is left of that unhappy race."
"What race?" I said. "Perhaps you can relate What brought the dwelling to its present state."
"Aye, sure I can; if not, it can't be told:
I've known it, sir, since I was ten years old;
Have witnessed all the changes as they passed,
Till into Chancery the thing was cast;
Where it may stay till every beam shall fall,
And every brick shall crumble from the wall.
I lived here, boy and man, near thirty years,
'Twas a long time, sir, though it now appears
'Most like a dream, so fast the days have flown,
But I'm an old man now, just eighty-one."

"Fain would I hear this history," I said,
"And what events to such disaster led."

The old man laid his hand upon the gate.
"The story's long, sir, and it's growing late—
The daylight in the west is on the wane;
But, if you're going down the Ash-tree Lane,
And can have patience with an aged man,
I'll tell it you as shortly as I can.
But take another look before you go.
That was her window just above the bow,
And there's the church-spire, by that crooked tree,
Just where the moon is rising up, you see—
You'll hear about them in the history.

"Ay! I remember—'twas the fifth of May;
I was a youngster, but I mind the day,
When young Frank Masterman brought home his bride;
No sweeter lass, sir, in the country-side.
If I had been a real poet born,
I would have sung this Rose without a thorn,
For, sir, her name was Rose, and she was known
Just by that name—'the Rose of Cheriton.'
I can recal her very look and dress,
The day she came in her young loveliness.
She was a Damask Rose, not pale and faint,
As one about to die and be a saint.
She had a fine rich bloom, that still would rise
When love or anger sparkled in her eyes.
Yes, sir, she could be angry; well she knew
A housewife's duties, and a servant's too.
She did her own, and always let us see
In her a pattern of what we should be.
A farmer's wife had then enough to bear,
Enough of labour and enough of care.
A large farmhouse was not a place of ease,
But like a beehive with a swarm of bees.
But she had sense and spirit for the thing,
And she could rule us, and without a sting;
She was a mistress of the days gone by,—
They're out of fashion in this century.
Up with the lark she was, as bright and fair
As morning flowers, and fresh as morning air.
No lagging milkmaid ever kept her place,
Unless she learnt the mistress' ways and pace.
Handy at everything, she took the lead,
And gave her help wherever there was need.
Quick as a needle, piercing wrong and right,
She always looked straight forward to the light.
I've heard the servants sometimes tell her lies,
And seen the power of her two steady eyes:
No one could stand it if they were to blame;
They might deny, but could not hide their shame.
I tried it once, and, as she looked me through,
Her two large eyes were full of melting dew:
She laid her hand upon my guilty head,
'So very young, and yet a liar!' she said.
'My poor boy Roger! Roger, speak the truth,
And grow up good, child, from your early youth.'
Now, sir, these words sound simple, I dare say,
But I cried over them a night and day;
And sooner than have told a lie again,
I would have borne a martyrdom of pain.
She held our hearts bound firmly in her hand—
She could not help it, she made no demand;
We gave them to her with respect and love.
We liked to call her 'Mistress,' and we strove
To do the very things she liked the best;
To please her, sir, and feel her interest,
Why, sir, I would have marched up to the stake,
If she had said, 'Do, Roger, for my sake.'
So they would all. She kept us in our place
Just by the love and spirit of her face.

"Aye, those old days! the farmer's kitchen then
Was just the place you'll never see again.
The long deal table in the middle stood,
Three times a day well filled with wholesome food;
There were the pewter platters, bright and clean,
A sight, may be, sir, you have never seen.

We used them then, for crockery was dear,
And pewter plates would last for many a year.
There on that mossy stone, the girl would stand,—
And, with the horn high lifted in her hand,
Sounded a summons for the men to come,
And all the hired servants hastened home,
Washed at the pump, and with a ruddy face,
And well-scraped shoes, came in, and took their place.
Just at this point the mistress' foot was heard;
Her quick eye glanced at once along the board,
And then as quickly passed from face to face,
And seemed to leave a blessing with the grace.
But woe to any laggard, rogue, or sot!
Her eye passed on as though she saw him not;
If e'er on me that blank displeasure fell,
It was as heavy as a funeral bell.
That was the way to rear up faithful bands—
The generous master had his trusty hands;
We felt an interest about the place,
Our crops, our stock, our pride, or our disgrace.

"Ours was as good a farm and fruitful ground
As you would find for many miles around;
And young Frank Masterman stood very high
For character, and skill in husbandry.
He was a husband worthy such a wife,
And, sir, he loved her as he loved his life;
For years I noticed that it was his way
To call her out to walk at close of day.
He'd tap the window, when his work was done,
And in a moment she'd her bonnet on;
And drew her gown up through the pocket-holes,
And nothing touched the earth except her soles.
You'd never find her walking down a street
With dusty skirts a-trailing round her feet.
It did one good to see her step along,
She looked so happy, and so light and strong!
And they would walk together round the farm;
And in the summer evenings, when 'twas warm,
They strolled about the meads and through the corn,
Till Bet, the girl, had blown the supper-horn.
Six little ones sprang round them like the flowers
That come in spring to gladden summer hours:
Just like a flight of steps, we used to say,
As gay as lambs, and innocent as gay.
She kept them all in hand, close under rule,—
Love was the law and order was the school.

"I've told you, sir, that I was then a boy,
Proud of my service, fond of my employ;
But as the years slipped by, and I began
To have the sense and feelings of a man,
I could but mark a difference and a loss—
The master grew more quarrelsome and cross;
And on that face of hers, so bright and fair,
There often hung a heavy cloud of care.
What cankerworm had come I could not guess,
To eat the core out of her happiness.
It was an inward trouble, you might tell:
As to the farm, it prospered very well;
As to the children, never was a flock
That did more credit to the parent stock;
And as to health, the doctor's horse, I've said,
Would pass the gate and never turn his head.
But still the trouble grew, he did not come
On market-nights so early to his home;
And as the time wore on, I've sometimes known
Him on the road as late as twelve or one.
I was the stable-man, and had to wait
To take his horse and fasten up the gate;
And I found out that deadly cankerworm—
Worse than the blight, or sleety winter storm.
However late the hour, sir, she was there,
To take him silently beneath her care.
Gentle and steady, not a word she said;
I often thought it might be from a dread
Lest he should answer—and then, I might think
That her dear husband was the worse for drink.
I never looked at her to see her face,
I could not do it, sir, to save my place.
She was a woman far beyond her time,
And always held that drinking was a crime;
And I may thank her—aye, I do, this hour,
That I was never crushed beneath its power.
Poor lady! my poor mistress! I could see
How patiently she bore her misery.
She never blamed him, sir, to any one;
Deep in her heart she bore her grief alone,
And things grew worse.
How was it, do you say?
I'll give the answer in my own poor way.

"You've heard about the wars of Buonaparte,
That roused a fire in every British heart?
Our men and money o'er the sea we sent
To fight the Frenchmen with our free consent.
We gave our blood and treasure, sir, like dust,
Because we would, sir, not because we must.
We helped our rulers to defeat the foe
Who laid in bloody war the nations low.
'Twas often rumoured that he meant to come
And see how Englishmen could fight at home.
Pity he didn't! we'd a welcome then
To give him that he would not court again.

"No doubt you've heard how war-time raised the corn,
Though I should guess 'twas long ere you were born.
Eight pounds a quarter I have known it sold;
Why, eating bread was then like eating gold!
Those were the times for farmers, sir, to rise—
The war to them was like a lottery prize;
And many a farmer got his pockets full
Without an equal balance in the skull.
They got their hunters, and their hounds, and wine,
Raved about politics and drank like swine;
But many saw the time, and bought up land
To make a fortune through the great demand.
And small landowners, tempted by the price,
Gave land for gold, and turned from men to mice;
As my poor father did, and now I am
A labourer on the land that bore his name.
The little farms were swallowed, one by one,
And soon the poor man's common-right was gone;
Where he could keep a donkey or a cow;
But that's a tale almost forgotten now.

'Twas a hard blow for many a labouring man,
But all our betters seemed to like the plan.

My master's ruin was prosperity :
A more industrious man you would not see,
Until this wondrous rise and price of grain
Fell on the farmers like a golden rain.
Then, like too many, my poor master fell
Into the trap that has a door to hell.
On market-days the farmers always met
To sell their corn, and some to drink and bet ;
And he was full of life and easy led,
And when the liquor mounted to his head,
Why, any rogue could use him for his tool,—
Cheat him at cards, and make him play the fool.
When sense returned to his distracted brain,
He vowed he'd win his losings back again.
And so there was no end—his self-respect
Was lost, as I should judge, and his neglect
Of home and business was a galling weight
That kept his temper always on the fret,
And drove him back to company and wine,
To run the fullest tether of his line.
And things all changed from what they used to be—
The farm was going back, 'twas plain to see :
She did her best to fill her husband's place,
But little could be done in such a case.

" Ay ! 'Tis a sight a good man's eyes might fill,
To see a brave heart breaking, slow and still.
I saw it then ; her cheek told me the tale—
November roses not more faint and pale.
And her clear eyes, that sparkled like a rill
In summer sunshine, now would film and fill,
If a stray word, or even a look, should start
The thoughts that always smouldered round her heart.
But, more than all, her voice—aye, that was sad !
The cheerful voice that made the household glad,
Was now as mournful as a hidden brook,
Or widowed turtle in a lonely nook ;
Or like that pitifullest sound we have—
A robin's song beside an orphan's grave.
I am no poet, sir, but there are times
When these old memories almost run in rhymes.
I've often thought that poesy was given
To comfort mourners on their way to heaven :
To let them find, all plain and fairly writ,
The feelings that no common words can fit.

" But to go back, sir. It was plain to see
Her heart was breaking slow and silently.
The children, pretty dears ! what could they know ?
And he, my master, cared for nothing now.
His mind was clouded by his drinking—yes,
He'd no heart left to feel for her distress.
Sometimes he was as fond as ever—then,
I think, she hoped he would come round again.
A broken cable, sir,—a broken oar !
A boat adrift that never reached the shore !
But she would smile, and tenderly would speak ;
And the old colour fluttered on her cheek,
Soon to depart, in darker, deeper gloom,
Till every bit of sunshine left the home.

I knew, sir, by her looks that she could tell
I guessed the whole, and pitied her as well.
And once or twice I thought she meant to speak ;
But ere the word, the tear ran down her cheek,
And she said nothing, but she turned away ;
And I, of course, could not make bold to stay.
I often wish I had ; it might have been
Some ease to speak, though but to one so mean.
When summer grass is withering on the plain,
The dew is welcome in default of rain.
I think she never spoke to any one,
Until the day she laid her burden down.
Her heart, sir, was too big—a woman's pride
Could not expose the husband at her side.

" The boys might notice their dear mother's brow
Had lost its light, and that her voice was low ;
But as to cause, or consequence, or fear,
They only thought of what did then appear.
Boys arn't like girls : the little lads could play,
And find enough diversion in the day.
But Lucy saw it all, and, though denied
To share the grief, scarce left her mother's side ;
Striving, with ready help and winning wiles,
To bring again the long-forgotten smiles.
And if the old glad laugh rang through the room,
The girl's pale cheek caught up her mother's bloom.
She was the age to feel—about fifteen—
Her mother's picture in her face and mien,
Except that she was pale and very shy.
The slightest word would make her colour fly ;
Her lips would tremble, and her speech would fail,
As if she'd heard some grim old witch's tale.
She had a sense of sorrow in her home ;
Untold, she knew that misery had come.
She feared the worst, and feared the most to speak,
And gained her knowledge from her mother's cheek.
A constant weight upon her spirit pressed,
And checked the warm life in her youthful breast.

" So matters stood. The heather on the moor
Was turning black, and all the summer store
Of honey had been taken, and the corn
Was safe within the rickyard and the barn ;
And some of us were ploughing for the wheat,
And some upon the moor were cutting peat
For winter firing ; and the sportsman's gun
Oft told that pheasant-shooting had begun ;
When mistress took a cold, I heard them say,
And grew a little weaker every day.
She was not ill—they thought she'd soon come round ;
But grief had gone before and mined the ground.
The pitcher at the fountain, sir, was broke ;
The shoulder failed beneath the heavy yoke ;
The oil was spent, the flame was flickering low ;
And any moment suddenly might go.
She told her husband that her end was near,
Begged him to stay, but he could see no fear ;
'Twas market-day, and he must sell his grain ;
He would not stop—he'd soon be back again.

" And so he went, and so the day slipped by,—
The last she spent beneath a cloudy sky.

Nine, — ten o'clock, had struck, and then she said,
'Open the window, I can hear his tread
Upon the gravel; he will soon be here.
Put on more wood, and make the fire burn clear.'
They flung it open, just to please her, sir;
They knew her hungry hope deluded her.
She listened heedfully, and then she said,
'Shut it again, and turn me in the bed,'
And they do think she slept a little while.
And when she woke, they say she had a smile
Upon her face, as though she might have been
Over the river where the fields are green.

"He did not come: I waited hour by hour,
As I had done a hundred times before;
And fearing I might sleep, walked down this lane.
The moon was sliding far into the wane,
'Twas wondrous still, and there was little light;
I don't remember such another night.
The yellow ash-leaves fell upon the ground;
Before my face without the slightest sound;
The oat-grass shivered like a human sigh,
As to and fro my steps kept pacing by.
And how it was I never yet could tell,
But all the while I heard a tolling bell.
I did not like it, sir,—a tingling chill
Crept through my blood, it was so lone and still;
And I went back into the stable-yard,
And heard the house-door quietly unbarred.
The nurse looked out and beckoned, I could see,
And called me to her, speaking mournfully.
'Your mistress wants to see you, lad,' she said;
'You follow me.' I did, sir, to the bed;
And then she snuffed the light, and set a chair,
And signed me to sit down, and left me there.

"And there my mistress lay, as meek and low
As a white lily on the drifted snow.
She smiled the faintest smile, and then she said,
'You'll not forget me, Roger, when I'm dead.
My time is short, and things are on my mind
To say to you, who will be left behind.
I cannot speak to many. You are young,
But you are good, and have a truthful tongue,
And you have served us since our wedding-day.
Don't leave your master when I'm gone away;
Keep things together; there may come a time
To warn him of his danger and his crime.
And oh! good Roger! if he should relent;
Tell him my last words charged him to repent,
That we may meet together at the last,
And never once remember what has passed.
And pray for him, good lad! I've prayed in vain,
But when I'm gone he may turn round again.
You, faithful Roger! you have known my grief;
And what you could you did for my relief.
It was too deep for human hand to stay;
A broken heart within my grave you'll lay.
'Twill soon be over, winding-sheet and pall,
A little dust and sod will cover all.
Not all, good lad. I've found a peaceful rest
For my poor soul upon my Saviour's breast.
Go to Him, Roger! He will be your friend;
And you will want Him ere the journey's end.
Good-bye, God bless you! I had thought to say
More of your master,—but another day.'—

"That day came not, sir. On the stroke of one
That very night she laid her burden down.
Just as her husband stumbled to the door,
Her soul flew forth, to light his home no more,—
Flew to her rest, before the golden throne,
And left us in the wilderness alone."*

IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.

THE RAISING FROM THE DEAD OF THE WIDOW'S SON AND THE RULER'S DAUGHTER.

Luke vii., 11—17; viii., 41—56; Matt. ix., 18—26; Mark v., 22—43.

The multitude that listened to the Sermon on the Mount followed Jesus from the hill-side into Capernaum, thronging round the house into which he entered, and pressing their sick so urgently on his notice that He "could not so much as eat bread." A mode of life like this,—out all night upon the mountain top, teaching, walking, working all day long without food or rest,—so affected the minds of his immediate relatives when they heard of it that they "went out to lay hold of him, for they said, he is beside himself." Failing in their endeavours, they left Him to pursue his eccentric course.

It was in the course of the busy day which followed the delivery of the Sermon on the Mount that the centurion's servant was healed, and the opportunity was thereby given to Jesus to hold up to the eyes of the people an example of such faith as He had not found—no, not in Israel. On the following day He left Capernaum. "Many of his disciples and much people" went with him. They had a long day's walk over the hills of Galilee, skirting the base of Tabor, and descending into the valley of Esdraelon. The sun was sinking in the west, away behind the ridge of Carmel, and was gilding with his evening beams the slopes of little Hermon, as Jesus and the band which followed Him approached the little village of Nain. This village is now a confused heap of the rudest Syrian huts, unenclosed, with no ruins of ancient buildings, nor any antiquities around, save the tombs in the rock upon the hill-side, where for ages they have buried the dead. And yet it stands next to Nazareth and Bethlehem and Bethany in the sacred interest attached to it. We are so sure of its identity, it is so small, so isolated, having nothing but the one wonderful incident to mark its history, that the Saviour's living presence was almost as vividly realised by us when entering it as when we sat by the side of Jacob's well. We stood at the end of the village which looks northward towards Galilee, and tried to recall the scene. Jesus and his train of followers have crossed the plain, and are drawing near to the village. Another company moves slowly and sadly out of its gate and meets them. It is a funeral procession; a large one, for all the villagers have come forth, but there is no mark or token that it is the funeral of one who had been rich or in any way distinguished. The bier is one of the plainest, and there follows it as chief mourner, a solitary woman, clad in humblest guise. Jesus has none beside Him, as He stops and looks, to tell Him who this woman is—who the dead for whom she mourns. He does not need the information; He knows her history; He knows her grief better than any inhabitant of Nain. To his eye it is a becoming and beautiful thing that grief like hers should have such homage paid to it, should have drawn the whole village out after her by the pure force of sympathy. Her claim, indeed, upon that sympathy is strong. This is not the first bier she has followed. She had wept for another before she wept for him whom they are now carrying to the grave. She is a widow—weeping now behind the bier of her only son. Bereft of every earthly stay she walks, a perfect picture of desolation.

"And when the Lord saw her he had compassion on her." As soon as his eye rests on her his heart fills full of pity. Was this the first funeral He had ever met in the way-side along with his disciples? Was this the first mourner He had ever noticed go weeping thus behind the dead? It might not have been so: yet never perhaps before had He seen a poor lone widowed mother shed such bitter tears over the death of an only son. The sight moves Him at least to do what He had never done before. He goes up to the woman, and says to her, "Weep not." Wrapped up in her consuming grief, how surprised she must have been at being accosted in such a way at such a time. Does this stranger mean to mock her, to deal rudely with her in her grief? In any other she might have been ready to repel and resent the unseasonable intrusion—the strange unreasonable speech; but there is something in the loving pitying eye that looks at her as she glances at Him timidly through her tears—something of hope, of promise, of assurance in the gentle yet authoritative tones of his voice that quenches all disposition to repel or resent. But why does Christ first say to her—weep not? Does He not know what He is about to do? Does He not know that within a few minutes that will be done by Him which, without any bidding on his part, will dry up all her tears? He does; but He cannot go forward to his great act without yielding to the impulse of pity; dropping into the ear of the mourner—not as a cold word of command, fitted only to give needless pain, but as a spontaneous expression of his warm personal compassion—the words, "Weep not." Such a preface to the miracle speaks to us as plainly of the tenderness of Christ's sympathy as the miracle itself proclaims the infinitude of his power.

"And he came and touched the bier, and they that bore him stood still." And all stand as still as the bearers; the two groups, the one from Capernaum and the other from Nain, lost in wonder as to what is to happen next. All eyes turn upon Jesus. His turn upon the bier. The silence is broken by the simple majestic words, "Young man, I say unto thee, arise." The young man rises, looks about with wonder, begins to speak. Jesus takes him by the hand, lifts him from the bier, delivers him to his mother. The deed of mercy is done, and nothing more is told, but that a great fear came upon all. "And they glorified God, saying that a great prophet is risen up among us, and that God hath visited his people, and this rumour of him went throughout all Judea, and throughout all the region round about."

It was a few days or weeks before or after this incident (for the date is uncertain) that one of the rulers of the synagogue at Capernaum, Jairus by name, came to Jesus as He sat at meat in the house of Levi, and "cast himself at his feet, and worshipped him, and besought him greatly, saying, My little daughter lieth at the point of death, come and lay thy hands upon her that she may be healed, and she shall live." Jesus arose at once and went with Jairus; so did his disciples, and so did much people; the very promptness of Christ's compliance with the ruler's request stimulating their curiosity. The distance could not have been great from the house of Levi to that of Jairus, and might speedily have been traversed, but the crowd that thronged around Jesus by the way somewhat impeded the movement. It gave, however, to one poor woman the opportunity she had long been seeking. Twelve long years she had been a sufferer, her illness one that made her touch pollution. All she had she had spent upon physicians. It seemed rather to have aggravated her complaint. Seeing or hearing about Jesus, a wonderful idea of the healing virtue that lay in Him had taken possession of her mind. Her timidity, her sense of shame, kept her from going openly to Him, telling Him of her malady, and asking Him to exert his power on her behalf. But if she could in any way unseen get at Him, if she could but touch his clothes, she felt that she should be made whole. And now He goes through this great crowd. It is the very occasion she has been seeking for, and she seizes it: gets behind Him, presses through the people, and touches the hem of his outer garment. She is instantly healed, but as instantly arrested. The touch has scarce been given, the healing scarce effected, when Jesus turns round and says, "Who touched my clothes?" They all deny the deed. Peter expostulates with his Master. "The multitude," he says, "throng thee and press thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me?" Jesus knows as well as Peter that many had been near enough for their and his garments to have come into contact; but He knows, too, as Peter knew not, that there had been a touch with a distinct, deliberate purpose, altogether different from that of a mere random contact, a touch that had drawn virtue out of Him. Who gave it? His eye looked round to see, is already resting on the woman, who, seeing that she is not hid, fearing and trembling, yet glad and grateful, throws herself on her knees before Him, and getting the better of all her womanly feelings, declares unto Him "before all the people for what cause she had touched Him, and how she was healed immediately."

Had Jesus been displeased at being touched? Had He grudged in any way that the virtue had in such a way been extracted? Was it to detect and rebuke a culprit that He had challenged the multitude? No: it was because He knew how very strong was this woman's faith,—a faith sufficient to draw out at once in fullest measure the healing efficacy, and yet a faith that had in it a superstitious element, the fancy that in some magical mysterious way contact of any kind established between her and Christ would cure her. If He allowed her to go away undetected, the healing filched, as it were, unconsciously from the healer, this fancy might be confirmed, the superstitious element in her faith enhanced. Therefore it was that He would not suffer the secrecy. He would meet and answer the faith which under the heavy pressure and in despair of all other help had thrown itself somewhat blindly yet confidingly upon his aid. But He will not allow her to depart without letting her know how wrong and how needless it had been in her to attempt concealment, without letting her and all around her know what was the kind of touch that she had given which had established the right connection between her and Him, and opened the way for the remedy reaching the disease. "And he said unto her, Daughter, be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole, go in peace."

There is not one of all our Saviour's many miracles of healing fuller of comfort and encouragement. For if his mode of dealing with our spiritual diseases be shadowed out in the modes of the bodily cures that He effected, whenever we grow sad or despondent as we think of what fear, or shame, or error, or weakness, or superstition mingles with the faith we cherish, then let us remember that if only the depth and inveteracy of the spiritual disease be felt, if with or without a long trial of them we have been led to despair of all other physicians of the soul, and to look alone to Jesus Christ, He who accepted this woman's faith with all its weakening and defiling ingredients will not cast us off. A timid trembling touch of Him, be it only the touch of humility and trust, will still bring forth that healing virtue which wraps itself up in no guarded seclusion, but delights to pour itself freely out into every open and empty receptacle that is brought to it.

The stoppage by the way, however brief, must have been somewhat trying to Jairus, but he showed no impatience. There was a short delay, but with it a new proof of Christ's power well fitted to fortify his faith. But just as the healed woman is sent away, the messenger arrives, who says, "Thy daughter is dead, why troublest thou the master any further?" The words were not meant perhaps for the ear of Christ, yet it caught them up, and the moment it did so, knowing and feeling to what a strain the faith of Jairus was exposed, and how much he needed to be assured and comforted, "as soon as Jesus heard the word that was spoken, he saith to the ruler of the synagogue, Be not afraid, only believe." Jairus hears the reassuring words, and heedless of the suggestion made, follows Jesus as before.

At last the house of the dead is reached. Jesus suffers none of his followers to enter with Him but Peter, James, and John, the three privileged Apostles who were with Him on the mount of his transfiguration and in the garden of his agony, the three chosen witnesses of the highest exercise of his power, the fullest display of his glory, the greatest depth of his sorrow. The first apartment of the ruler's house is occupied with those who fill it with a perfect tumult of bemoaning sounds. It was the custom to hire such mourners on such occasions,—the more numerous, the more vehement, the higher the station of the family. The outward demonstration of grief that they here make is excessive, but there is no heart in all the sound and show, no true utterance of any real sorrow. As at discord at once with his own feeling and with his formed purpose, Jesus rebukes the wailers, and says to them, "Give peace; why make ye this ado? the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth." Not dead? Can they, the hired officials, not tell the difference between sleep and death? Who is he that speaks to them so slightingly, so authoritatively taking it on him, stranger though he be, to stop their lamentations? They "laugh him to scorn:" this real laughter still more incongruous with his presence and his purpose than the feigned grief. With Jairus to second Him Jesus puts all the people out, takes "the father and the mother of the damsel, and them that were with him, and entereth in where the damsel was lying." He takes the dead child by the hand, simply says, Tabitha cumi—damsel, arise! and she rises, weak as from a bed of illness, yet with all the seeds of the mortal malady which had laid her low banished from her frame. Having directed that some food should be given her, Jesus straitly charged the parents that they should tell no man; an injunction, let us believe, that they did their best to keep, and yet St. Matthew tells us "the fame thereof went abroad into all that land."

It is difficult to understand why it was that Jesus laid such a stringent injunction of secrecy upon the parents in this instance. Had the widow's son not been raised from the dead about the same time, and in circumstances of the utmost publicity, we might have imagined that there was a desire on the part of Christ to throw, for a time at least, a veil over this particular form of the manifestation of his power. But though that other miracle had not been wrought, though this one stood alone, how could it be hidden? There were too many who had seen the damsel die, or mourned over her when dead, to allow of any concealment. As we think of the difficulty, we might almost say impossibility of such concealment, the thought occurs (and other instances in which the same command was given by Christ may in the same way be explained) that it was not so much with any desire or intention to secure secrecy that the order was issued, as to prevent those who had the closest personal interest in the miracle being the first or the loudest in noising it abroad.

There does not seem to have been any previous acquaintance between Christ and the widow of Nain. It may be doubted whether she had ever seen Jesus till she met Him as she was going out to bury her son. We do not read of Jesus ever being in Nain but on that one occasion. It lay beyond the line of those circuits of Galilee which He was in the habit of making. We are not surprised, therefore, at noticing that his interference there was voluntary, without any solicitation or hope entertained beforehand on the part of the mourner. It was different with Jairus at Capernaum. He was a well-known man, living in the town which Jesus had chosen as his head-quarters in Galilee. In all likelihood he was one of the rulers of the Jews who formed the deputation that a short time before had waited on Jesus to ask his aid on behalf of the Roman centurion. It was quite natural that, when his "one only daughter" lay a-dying, he should apply on her account to Christ. But there may have been something of which we are ignorant in his character and connections, which made it undesirable that he should be forward in proclaiming what had happened in his house.

It was a case of recovery from the dead, about which there might be some cavilling. The child could have been but a short time dead; long enough, indeed, to establish the certainty of the event, yet not so long as to hinder any one from saying that it was literally and not figuratively true, "She is not dead, but sleepeth." In this respect we notice a difference, a progression in the three instances of raising from the dead recorded by the Evangelists—that of Jairus' daughter, of the widow's son, and of Lazarus. It is not distinctly said to be so; but we presume that these were the only three cases in which the dead were restored to life by Christ. The one was soon after death, the other immediately before burial, the third after the dead man had lain four days in the grave—the variety of the period after death at which the restoration was in each case effected not, perhaps, without a purpose. For these three great miracles stand, in one respect, at the head of all our Lord's works of wonder. They were the highest instances of the forth-putting of his divine almighty power. With respect to many of his other works, questions might be raised as to the nature or extent of the power required for their performance, but none as to these. Life in all its forms, from the highest to the lowest, is that mysterious thing which, when once destroyed, none but the Creator—the great life-giver—can restore. Were a dead man actually revivified before our eyes, we could not doubt that the power of the Omnipotent had gone forth to do it. In no case did Jesus Christ so conspicuously and undoubtedly show Himself to be clothed with that power as when He raised the dead. The power, indeed, by which He wrought such miracles might not have been naturally his own. It might have been a delegated power, given Him for the time, not permanently belonging to Him. He might have raised the dead as Elijah raised the son of the widow at Zarephath, as Elisha did the son of the Shunamite. Had it been so, we should have had some evidence thereof—some appeal on the part of the mere human agent to the great Being whose power was for the moment lent and exercised. It was with trouble and with pain, after much and earnest prayer, that Elijah and Elisha, the only raisers of the dead in all the preceding ages, had succeeded. No one who saw or heard them could have imagined that they claimed any natural or inherent power of their own over the dead to call them back to life. They would themselves have counted it as the greatest insult to Jehovah to do so. How is it in this respect with Jesus Christ? Stand beside Him as He calls the dead to life. Look at the manner of his acting, listen to the words that He employs. Is it as a servant, the delegate of another, that He speaks and acts? Is it with any consciousness on his part, felt or exhibited, that He was rising above the level at which He ordinarily stood, that He was then doing something which He had been specially commissioned and supernaturally qualified to accomplish? Surely there is nothing more remarkable about these raisings from the dead by Jesus Christ than the simple, easy, unostentatious way in which they were effected. "Young man, I say unto thee arise"—"Maid, arise"—"Lazarus, come forth." He speaks thus to the dead, and they hear and live. It is in the style of Him who said, Let there be light, and there was light. It is the Lord of the living and of the dead whose voice penetrates the unseen world, and summons the departed spirit to resume its mortal tenement.

But if, as to the power He wields, Jesus never presents Himself to our eye in a diviner, never does He show Himself in a more human aspect than in these raisings from the dead. Can we overlook the fact that they were those of the only son of a widowed mother, the only daughter, if not the only child, of two fond parents, the only brother of two affectionate sisters—of those whose loss in their respective homesteads would be so deeply felt, of those whose restoration quickened so acute a grief into such an extatic joy? And in each case there was something quite singular in the tenderness of our Lord's conduct towards the mourners. He knew beforehand how speedily the anxiety that He witnessed would be relieved, all the sorrow be chased away; but the "weep not" to the mother before He touched the bier, the "fear not, only believe," to the agitated father, the tears that fell before the grave of Lazarus, what a testimony do they bear to the expuisite susceptibility of the Saviour's spirit—to the quickness, the fulness, the liveliness of his sympathy with human grief. It is even then, when He is most divine, that He is most human—when He lifts Himself the highest above our level that He links Himself the closest to us as a true brother of our humanity. Such power to help, such readiness and capacity to sympathise, meet but in one Being.

Many passages of the New Testament might be quoted which assign it as one of the reasons of the Incarnation that there might be such a Being, one compassed about with infirmities, one touched with a fellow-feeling with our infirmities, one tempted in all things like as we are, a merciful as well as a faithful, a compassionate as well as an all-powerful, all-prevalent High Priest over the House of God. The great Son of God, when He stooped to become a man, did not become thereby more merciful, more kind, more compassionate than He had been ; yet are we not warranted to believe that a human element was introduced and infused into them which otherwise the mercy, kindness, compassion should not have possessed. If the Manhood was a gainer by bringing it into close, mysterious union with the Divinity, was there no gain to the Divinity by the Incarnation ?—not, of course, a gain absolutely, not a gain as to the increment of any original, essential faculty or attribute of the Supreme, but a gain as to the bringing of the Divine Being into closer and more sympathetic fellowship with man ? We all know how difficult it is, whatever be the natural capacity and largeness of our pity, to sympathise fully and tenderly with a kind of trial we have never felt. Those who have never wept over any dead they loved, can they enter into the grief of the bereaved ? And how could we, but by the Incarnation, have had one who could enter as Jesus can into all our sorrows ?

Why was such a sympathy as his provided for us, but that as sinners as well as sufferers we might cast ourselves upon it for support ? Jesus is the great raiser of human souls as well as of human bodies. He quickeneth whom He will. The hour has come when all that are in the grave of sin, of spiritual death, may hear his voice. That voice is sounding all around us as in the ears of the dead. Awake, it says to each of us—awake thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life. Let us awake, and with life new-given turn to the life-giver ; rejoicing to know that as tenderly as He handed her new-raised son to the widow of Nain, as tenderly as He ordered the food to be given to the little daughter of Jairus, as tenderly will He watch over the first stages of our spiritual being ; and that as fully as the griefs of widowed mother and weeping parents were shared in of old by Him in Galilee, as fully will He share in all the griefs of our earthly history, till He take us to that land where his own gracious hand shall wipe off the tears from every eye, and we shall need no more another to weep with us in our sorrows.

WORK FOR SUNBEAMS.

One day, when Stephenson, the celebrated engineer, was in company with Dr. Buckland, the geologist, their attention was arrested by a railway train flashing along, tossing behind its long white plume of steam. "Can you tell me," said Stephenson to his companion, "what is the power that is driving that train ?"—"Well," said the other, "I suppose it is one of your big engines."—"But what drives the engine ?"—"Oh, very likely, a canny Newcastle driver."—"What do you say to the light of the sun ?"—"How can that be ?" asked the doctor.—"It is nothing else," said the engineer ; "it is light bottled up in the earth for tens of thousands of years,—light absorbed by plants and vegetables, being necessary for the condensation of carbon during the process of their growth, if it be not carbon in another form,—and now, after being buried in the earth for long ages in fields of coal, that latent light is again brought forth and liberated, and made to work as in that locomotive for great human purposes." *

The explanation of the process thus briefly referred to we take to be this. Plants, as is well known, and especially those of great size, require a large measure of light and heat. In the process of growing, they absorb carbon from the atmosphere, where it exists in the form of carbonic acid gas. It is to enable them to do this that the heat and light of the sun seem to be requisite ; by an interesting physical law, the heat and light thus received generate the energy which enables the plant to absorb the carbon. But when the plant, reduced to the form of wood or coal, undergoes combustion, the opposite process takes place. It restores its carbon to the atmosphere in the form of carbonic acid gas ; and in doing so, it gives back the solar beams which it had borrowed and laid up in the process of its growth. Thus the engineer might say that it was the light of the sun that drove the steam-engine ; and what looks so like a dream becomes a simple fact ; that beams of the sun, or at least beams of the same quality, stored up ages ago in the bowels of the earth, are the great moving power in our British machinery at the present day ; our workshops with all their rattle of wheels and belts, steam-hammers, rolling mills, and other gigantic contrivances, our locomotives by land, our steam-ships by sea—our power-looms, our spinning-jennies—in fact, nearly all the mechanism that makes our industry so remarkable, are driven by means of bottled sunbeams—essences that have lain in a latent form in Nature's coal-cellar since the carboniferous formations were deposited, but are now turned by combustion into a force so active and so powerful as to be the wonder of the world.

Is there not something corresponding to this in the spiritual world ? At the anniversary meetings of the religious societies we see the train of Christian philanthropy flashing along, with its various compartments of home and foreign missions, Bible and tract circulation, schools, refuges, reformatories, and other schemes, whose name is legion. What is the power that is driving that train ? We hope that in the main the engineer's answer may be given—sunbeams. Sunbeams of divine love and grace that have first fallen on hearts at home, and are now constraining these hearts to do what in them lies for those that sit in darkness and in the region and shadow of death. But we need not confine the application of the symbol to the operations of benevolent societies. It is by a similar process that all the movements and operations of the new life are mainly provided for. First of all, the heart of man becomes the recipient of sunbeams ; the rays of the Sun of Righteousness fall upon it with a richness and profusion that can hardly be conceived; but these rays are not designed to remain in it in a latent form for ever; they are to be given back, to be turned into a great power, and made to work for the welfare of the world and the glory of God. Many persons are willing enough to take in, but far from ready to give out. They are willing to be absorbents, but not dispensers of the sunbeams. But nothing could be more selfish or unfair. In such a case, the grand purpose of the Divine arrangement is defeated; and the power which God has gendered for the welfare of the world, like the talent of the unprofitable servant, is folded in a napkin, and buried in the ground. I would fain say a few words to stimulate to the exercise of the dispensing faculty; many beams of sunshine, I am sure, have fallen on every one of us, though more on some than on others; would to God that every one was jealous over himself with godly jealousy,—alarmed lest in the end of the day it should be found that there was a vast disproportion between what he had absorbed, and what he had given back—between the love that God had poured on him, and the love that in God's name and for Christ's sake, he had sought to pour on the world around him.

There are various sorts of moral or spiritual sunbeams; it may be enough on this occasion to notice four:—1. Human love; 2. Providential love; 3. Redeeming love; 4. Glorifying love.

I.

In the form of Human love we begin to absorb the sunbeams very early. They fall in showers on the new-born infant in loving looks and gentle words, and caresses innumerable imprinted on the downy cheek. Under ordinary circumstances, the sunbeams are continued more or less through the early years, in the innumerable acts of a mother's tenderness, and in the constancy and cheerfulness with which the fruits of a father's toil are applied to supply the wants of his children. In after years, cases are more liable to differ; but there are some on whom a great profusion and variety of human love constantly comes down, sisterly love, brotherly love, conjugal love, filial love, making life's atmosphere very balmy, and showing in what pleasant places their lines have been made to fall. It is a sad and miserable thing when children grow up without any of this sunshine; when the daily influences of life are all harsh and stern, fitted to freeze the spirit of confidence and affection, and develop nothing but cunning and fear. We don't wonder in such circumstances to find a stunted and miserable growth of character; for what can we look for in the child of drunken and savage parents, or in one who has never heard from a master or an employer any words but those of stern command, or harsh rebuke? If it has been otherwise with us, let us thank God with all our heart; and then let us consider how largely the fact of our having received so much of human love constitutes us debtors to our fellow men. For surely we cannot fancy that all these human sunbeams that God has directed on us from the first hour of our life are designed to be locked up in our own bosom for ever. Surely we have got them that we may give them back. We have had our use of them, and very pleasant it has been, but let others have the benefit as well. There are those, it may be, that stand in the same relation to us that we have stood in to our benefactors. Let us make sure that what we reflect down on them is not less than what was reflected down on ourselves. There is something very unjust, as well as otherwise scandalous, when one who has had kind and careful parents becomes a harsh mother or a careless father, and gives back to his children none of the sunshine that fell on himself in his early home. Does that parent not rob his children of what he got for them—rob them of what is more valuable and more vital for their highest welfare than if he squandered the gold or wasted the acres which may have been entrusted to his care for their benefit? It is the well-known property of fluids that they can rise to their own level: and surely it were but reasonable that in families love should rise to its level, that there should be no falling off from the attainments of preceding generations, that the force of the domestic sunshine should sustain no diminution, when "instead of the fathers there shall be the children."

But there is a wider sphere for the diffusion or reflection of that sunshine which comes to many in the form of human love. Looking round you on the world, how many poor creatures are there who are pining and languishing for want of those sunbeams that may have fallen so richly on you. How many orphan children are there, and children worse than orphans, on whom hardly anyone ever smiled, and whose hearts no one tries to gladden? What tales of loneliness and frigidity might not our poor-houses unfold, and those obscure and repulsive dwellings where the poorest of our people drag out uncheered and sunless lives? You, whose cup God has made to run over, you whom goodness and mercy have followed all the days of your life, is there no way by which your abundance of sunshine may minister to their want? Can you not turn your hearts into mirrors, so as to throw upon the dingy dwellings and straw pallets of age, and poverty, and disease, a few of the sunbeams that meet so profusely upon you? Think you, were you made to absorb all the love of humanity? Were you not made to diffuse it as well? And do you not feel that it is a far higher and nobler thing to diffuse than merely to absorb—more blessed, as our Lord said, in this as in other senses, to give than to receive?

II.

Sunbeams may fall on us in the form of Providential love. The circumstances of men vary much in this respect, but probably few among us have not some cause to acknowledge that a great amount of providential sunshine has fallen to our lot. Few thoughtful people in this country, surveying the nations of the world groaning under despotisms, and looking probably to the sword as their only hope, can fail to acknowledge the goodness that makes us to differ. But let us never fancy that these providential sunbeams have fallen on us to inflate us with pride and self-sufficiency. Freely we have received, freely let us give. If we have absorbed the sunbeam of freedom, let us give it back in compassion for the enslaved, and in prayers and efforts for their emancipation. If we have drunk in the beams of peace and plenty, God forbid that we should use them for mere luxury and show and self-indulgence; let us reflect them in compassion for the distressed, and in help to the needy. If our health be good, and our employment steady and agreeable; if our house be happy, and our lot be cast among kind-hearted friends and neighbours; if we have received the benefits of education, and live under influences favourable to all healthful exercise of mind and body, let us not turn our hearts into a cellar where these sunbeams may be locked up, but shed them out freely in the form of similar blessings on all whose lot is darker and poorer. And if we feel that such precious things of the earth and the fulness thereof have not come to us on an independent footing, but are due to the good will of Him that dwelt in the bush, and that they are inseparably combined with the Bible and the Gospel, let us be all the more zealous in circulating the Bible, and propagating the Gospel, that the like blessings may come upon the head of every banished and imprisoned Joseph—upon the top of the head of him that in Providential blessings is separated from his brethren.

III.

To the sunbeams of Redeeming love we give a peculiar welcome. "Hail, holy light, offspring of heaven first born!" Beyond all doubt they constitute the most wonderful phenomenon our world presents. The wonder lies in this, that while they are the richest of heaven's beams, they are directed towards objects most unworthy and repulsive; the Son of God, manifesting the undivided love of the Godhead, clasps to his heart filthy creatures that He might have been rather expected to drive from his presence. Redeeming love is a feeling of wonderful elevation and purity; it gives us a conception of the beauty of God's nature above anything that our own thoughts would ever have reached. But redeeming love is not a mere feeling. It is love that exemplifies itself in act and in sacrifice; love that became incarnate in the person of Jesus; love that sustained his life of labour and self-denial, love that bore the curse, till the curse was exhausted, till its reign was rung out with the word "It is finished."

I fear that many good people never come, as they might come, under the direct influence of redeeming love, and do not therefore realise its marvellous power. Its beams seem to fall on them obliquely or slantwise, as the rays of the sun fall on the earth in winter; or rather, perhaps we should say, there is a cloud or curtain of unbelief that stretches between them and the Sun of Righteousness, and intercepts the balmy influences that would otherwise descend on their hearts.

But take a case in which there was not even a film to intercept the Sun of Righteousness. St. Paul knew redeeming love, not as a theory or an abstraction, but as a blessed personal fact. He could describe the Son of God, not in general terms merely as the author of salvation, but in closest personal relation to himself. "The Son of God who loved me, and gave himself for me." And the blessed sense St. Paul had of this great truth was the key to his life, the secret of his power. He felt that when utterly unworthy, he had received into his heart the richest beams of redeeming love, and all his anxiety was, to give back the love that had been poured upon him,—to give it back to Christ in the form of adoring gratitude, and to spread it over the world in the way of missionary activity and zeal. He felt himself, as the recipient of redeeming love, a debtor to Christ, and a debtor to the world, infinitely beyond what his utmost exertions could ever repay. To him it would have been simply incomprehensible how any one could be the recipient of these sunbeams, and not burn with the desire to reflect them on others. The love of Christ constraineth us, he said; it was in him like God's word in Jeremiah, a burning fire in his bosom; it constrained him not merely to tell about it, but to practise it; to forgive, and to bless, and to love, and to comfort, as God for Christ's sake had forgiven, and blessed, and loved, and comforted him.

Have you been forgiven, and yet can you not forgive? Have you absorbed this glorious sunbeam, and yet can you not give it out again? It is amazing how some people professing to be Christians stagger at this most fitting and natural return. Alas! it was no solitary case of refusal to give out what had been taken in, that our Lord described in the parable of the unmerciful servant. The debt which redeeming love cancels to every believer, bears no less a proportion to the debt which an offending brother owes to us, than the ten thousand talents bore to the one hundred pence. Yet are there not many professing Christians who after thanking their Lord for having freely forgiven them the ten thousand talents, go forth to seize some fellow-servant by the throat, and load him with reproaches for his evil conduct. Is it too much for you, my brother, to forgive your greatest enemy? Is it more than your nature can achieve to banish every bitter and contemptuous feeling, to take him to your heart, and to pray God to bless him with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus? If it be,—if you have no power to give back the sunbeam of forgiving love,—what is that sunbeam doing in you? Have you received it? Have you received it to lock it up in your heart, that it may never go forth on further errands of mercy,—that it may never serve to make known or convey an impression of the love there is in heaven? Men of science are telling us that in nature energy is never lost. It may pass into new forms, it may become latent for a time, but it comes forth again, showing that once launched into existence, it goes on and on for ever. Oh, surely in the spiritual world, energy should not be lost! The love that falls on the sinner's heart when he looks up to the cross and sees the dying Lamb of God, and hears the word of forgiveness, should not be buried in the heart it has warmed and quickened and blessed. Don't let its blessed career stop with you. Go and let it radiate from you on some other heart, and who can tell but it may radiate from it again to another and another, latent, perhaps, for a time, but never lost, and never completing its cycle of blessing, till the great day connects the end with the beginning.

The idea of redeeming love is not that of a single act. At the beginning, indeed, there is one act of surpassing grace,—the act of free forgiveness; but all along the believer's life, fresh sunbeams are ever falling on him from the Sun of Righteousness. In the Epistle to the Ephesians, one of the believer's privileges is described as that of sitting with Christ in heavenly places. Such heavenly places are all a-glow with sunbeams. The Lord's Supper, for example, when the Lord himself is present, and his servant feels that He is near—what happy thoughts it brings! How the Lord rejoices as it were in Jerusalem, and joys in his people, and seems to feel as if He could not utter words sweet enough, or do acts kind enough to show his love. How manifold are the delights of a communion-exercise, when your heart is thoroughly in the spirit of it! How gentle and winning the voice of the beloved, "I am come into my garden, my sister, my spouse; I have gathered my myrrh with my spice; I have eaten my honey-comb with my honey; I have drunk my wine with my milk; eat, O friends, drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved." How blessed it is to behold the memorials of a sacrifice that has made an end of sin, and in eating and drinking these memorials, find a symbol of the indissoluble nature of the union between the believing sinner and his Saviour! How glorious to think we have a Saviour who can and will provide for our every want,—one, too, who is as tender in his human sympathies as He is glorious in his divine majesty, who knows and loves us as well as if we were an only child, and who says with a truth and tenderness that cannot be equalled, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee. Recipients of such sunbeams, is there no way of giving out what it is thus your privilege to take in? Are you not laid under a great debt by the reception of all these heavenly blessings? Enriched so greatly, can you make no use of them in the way of enriching others? You may feel deeply that anything you can do in this way is so inferior to what Christ has done for you, as not to be worthy to be named in the same breath. Any loving words or deeds of yours to your fellows seem so cold compared with Christ's that you are ashamed of them. But remember what was said of the woman that anointed Christ, "She hath done what she could." The moonbeam is cold compared with the sunbeam, but the one is the reflection of the other; and, inferior though it be, it serves important purposes to our world. The men at the king's right hand could not think what they had ever done to draw out the praises of the judge, until he solved the riddle by identifying himself with the poorest and meanest of his people, "Inasmuch as ye did it to the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."

Still further, let us think of redeeming love in some of its more ordinary manifestations, and consider in such cases the duty of giving back what we have received. If in the trials and anxieties of the Christian life, we have heard from Christ many words that have been soothing and cheering to us, ought we not to give back these sunbeams, by trying to speak soothing and cheering words to those in trouble? If many a cry of ours has been heard, and many a petition granted, ought we not in return to hear with patience the petition of the downcast, and do what we can, if there be wrong or suffering, to relieve and remedy? If tenderness has been shown to us by our Lord when we were in error, should we not show tenderness to others? If we have been kept from falling, should we not try to strengthen the weak hands and confirm the feeble knees? In short, may we not find in connexion with all the blessings of the Christian life opportunities for exemplifying the great duty of giving out what we have taken in, and thus averting the reproach that we have not rendered according to the benefit received?

IV.

If redeeming love be the most wonderful phenomenon in this world, GLORIFYING LOVE is surely the most wonderful in that which is to come. Already the fulness of the divine love is very amazing, and yet, compared with what remains, it is but as the cluster of Eshcol to the land flowing with milk and honey. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us that we should be called the sons of God! . . . Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is." We shall be like Him; "for whom He did foreknow them also did He predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that He might be the first-born among many brethren." "Christ loved the Church and gave himself for it, that He might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word: that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing." When the Church is thus washed, her marriage-day shall have arrived, and the era of her brightest glory. Then shall be the time of richest sunbeams! Then shall come the fulfilment of the prayer, "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am." Then shall come the closest fellowship with the Saviour, when each disciple shall feel as near as if he leant on his bosom, as if his left hand was under his head, and his right hand embraced him. And no night shall break in on this glorious day. "Thy sun shall no more go down by day, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thy everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended!"

But how shall the redeemed ever give back such sunbeams as these? We cannot answer the question fully, for "it doth not yet appear what we shall be." But to this extent we can answer it: they will give them back in glowing tributes to the Lamb, of adoration, love, and confidence, and in the constant radiation of loving feelings to one another. The atmosphere will be full of sunbeams. From the great central Sun they will be ever falling on every heart, and from every heart they will be going back to Him from whom they came, as well as reflected on this side and on that, wherever members of the family may be. It is this sunshine of love that constitutes heaven. How different from what is often found even in the fellowship of Christians on earth, with its atmosphere of suspicion, and bitterness, and contempt for those who cross their path! Alas, that when men, disgusted with the bitterness and selfishness of the world, turn to the professedly Christian Church in the hope of finding a purer and nobler fellowship, saying to themselves—"Surely in this, the family of God, we shall find hearts generous and true, incapable of meanness or greed, kind and sympathising to those in trouble, forbearing and patient to the erring, purged from all malice and envy, not seeking their own, but, like their Master, delighting to spread sunshine on every side"—alas, that they should at any time find, that under a religious covering the old bitterness and bigotry are as strong as ever! Would that Christian men and women, without exception, were animated by a holy desire to make earth as like heaven as possible—and, for this end, would try to give back the sunbeams they have received, and trust more than they often do to the great power by which Christ achieves such victories—"the mighty working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself!"

NEHEMIAH.

O TRUE light heart!
Light as the dancing bubbles of red wine
That crown the cup for him, almost divine,
Whose cup-bearer thou art.

Why art thou sad?
Kings with great cares like not sour looks, and thou
Wast chosen for thy ever-sparkling brow,
And smile aye sunny-glad.

Thou art not sick;*
Sullen thou never wert; as free thy song,
Though captive, as a bird's the meads among
And copses thick.

Light heart, but true!
True to thy God 'mid Shushan's golden dream,
True to those hearts that wept by Babel's stream,
Thou'rt still a Jew.

To-day thine eye
Sees not the sparkling wine, the gilded hall;
But, far beside a city's broken wall,
A tomb dishonoured, lie.†

True heart, again be light!
Thy God hath heard thee, and the king hath said,
"Go, build the wall that guards the sacred dead—Go, in my might."

Go, guileless Nehemiah,
Serpent Sanballat lurks beside the wall,
And, low among the stones, with scorpion crawl,
The slave Tobiah.‡

But fear them not!
Nor yet the craven crew within, their prey,
False prophets, mongrel priests, cheats, usurers grey.
How changed thy lot!

True heart, but light no more!
The world's rude breath hath blown the froth away
That hid the clear dark wine; O Tirshatha,
Thy happiest days are o'er!

So from the heavenly throne
Good angels sent to comfort them that mourn
Are never seen to smile till they return,
And hear their Lord's "Well done."

Stout heart, clear head, clean hand,
An upward eye that sees the guiding light;
These shall direct thy way through darkest night
Unto the far bright land.

All slept beneath the moon*
That night, when thou didst thread thy lonely way
Along the hallowed boundary, where lay
In heaps the wall o'erthrown.

But lo! the rubbish stirs!
The heaps revive† beneath the busy hands
Of soldier-masons, wielding tools, or brands,
As sound the trumpeters.

Stone treads on stone,
With solemn march moves on the wall divine,
'Mid taunting foes, along the broken line
That once was Sion's zone.

And soon the ends shall meet!
And clasp again a virgin undefiled,
And thou shalt bring her, cleansed and reconciled,
To her Redeemer's feet.

The Lord remember thee?‡
Yes; nought thou ever didst for Him give up,
Heart's lightness, peace, or pleasure's sparkling cup,
But shall remembered be.

To thee it shall be given,
To shine among the saints at Christ's right hand,
With Moses and Elias there to stand,§
And crown the cup of heaven.

SOME THOUGHTS ON PRAYER.

It is surely a mistake to treat of prayer merely as a duty. The essential idea of prayer is that it is one of the highest Christian privileges. Not that they are right who say that it is never enjoined on us as a duty; and more especially that our blessed Lord never commands us to pray. He commands us to pray for labourers in the harvest; He has told us to besiege God with importunities as one that would wake up a sleeping friend to give him bread; and in the writings of His apostles we have similar injunctions and commands. But the general teaching of the New Testament does not so much command us to pray—enjoin the duty of prayer—as tell us how great a privilege it is. The possession of any privilege does, indeed, involve an obligation to use it, and of this obligation we need to keep ourselves in mind; but the best way of doing so is to bethink us of what we miss when we neglect it.

Let us look, for example, at one of the most familiar exhortations in the epistles: "Be careful for nothing: but in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." (Phil. iv. 6, 7.) Though the 7th verse is often used—and may be rightly used—without reference to what precedes; it is in reality an assurance of the blessed result of believing prayer, as if it were: Be careful for nothing; but in everything let your requests be made known unto God—and so the peace of God shall keep your hearts and minds. If we distinguish between "prayer" and "supplication," so as to regard the one as descriptive of the attitude in which we appear before God; the other of the specific requests which we lay before His mercy-seat; we have the text as a whole teaching that if we go to God humbly, and ask of Him each thing that we need, we shall be possessed by the peace that passeth understanding. In short, this text teaches the privilege of believing prayer.

Let us take it up as such, and attending to its terms for a little, ask how such prayer as is described secures such peace. We answer—

1st. We put ourselves in unison with the will of God when we so pray.—The man who commits himself soul and body unto God in prayer, is beyond the reach of further disturbance. He dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, and abideth under the shadow of the Almighty. Everything will work together for his good, and he knows it. This is peace. This is oneness with God's will. He dwelleth in God and God in him. This attitude of prayer is what God desires of us. He does not wish to shower down blessings on inanimate or unregarding creatures: his wish is to hear the cry of those that fear Him, and to save them. His will is that our blessings should come in answer to prayer.

2nd. Thus praying, we can wait for a delayed answer to our prayers; if need be, can even bear a refusal. We have attained to unison with God. We have told our Father all we need. We have merged our will in His. We have told Him all our care, and have asked Him to relieve it; but we are well aware that his knowledge is greater than ours, and we can trust the future to Him. Many a child asks of his father what it would not be good for himself to get; and every wise parent will early impress on his child that in very love he must refuse to give such things; that he knows best; so as to have no pettish pouting when every little wish is not granted, so that even though disappointed, the child shall go away fully persuaded that his parent's will is wiser and better than his own. Thus our heavenly Father would have us earnestly pray, and then rest in a conviction like this:—"I have asked God my Father, and He knows all things: He will give me my desire if it is good for me, and if it is not good, He will give me something better." This secures the peace of God; and if we have ever known any measure of that peace, do not our hearts tell us that its fulness must be the "peace that passeth understanding?"

But we observe further, that this "peace will keep our hearts and minds through Christ Jesus" (or more literally, in Christ Jesus.)

We have spoken of our securing the peace of God. But let us not forget how. It keeps us. God keepeth his people. They do not keep Him, but they give themselves up to Him, and He keeps them as the apple of his eye.

But we are taught that this peace of God will keep us "in Christ Jesus." Without attempting to exhaust the meaning of these words, we may so far explain them by saying, that in using our privilege of prayer, we follow the Saviour's example. He prayed in his need: before some of his great miracles; before his great sufferings. After the prayer in the garden, He went forth in the peace of God, knowing what was to come and feeling ready for it; saying, "Arise, let us go hence."

Moreover, it is in Christ's spirit we pray when we make all our requests known unto his Father and our Father, unto his God and our God. He was heard in that He feared. He feared to desire anything apart from his Father's will; and his prayer renewed and strengthened that holy communion with his Father by which He lived. He committed Himself unto Him that judgeth righteously. He feared to fail in doing his Father's will. So we need to fear; to fear lest we set up our desires as a standard, lest we seek anything before communion with God and unison with his holy will. For we have to learn what Christ showed us, that the great aim of prayer is not to obtain this or that present blessing, but to do the will of the Father who hath sent us; and we cease to be "careful" when we can put ourselves into His hands who ruleth all, and who findeth our spirits the hardest of all to rule.

When Christ prayed at the grave of Lazarus, He referred to a previous prayer, thanking God that it had been heard. His prayer in the garden was also heard, for it closed with "Thy will be done;" and God's will was done,—not the desire of His shrinking human heart,—but He was enabled to do it and to bear it. So, when we make our requests known unto God with thanksgiving and hope, we have the mind in us which was also in Christ Jesus; and thus the peace which keepeth us keepeth us "in Him." Not only do we draw near to God through Him as our intercessor and advocate, not only do we plead with God in his name, but our communion is such that He dwelleth in us and we in Him.

And now, when all this is so, mark the privilege of prayer. It is the means of attaining to this state of union with God. It is wonderful; it passeth wonder, that when I "lift up my voice" to God, even in the half-spoken whisper or in the unuttered longings of the heart, I have used the mightiest power which a human being can ever wield. I have sent forth my will unto the Infinite and Eternal; and it will be felt through the universe—felt when time and all things temporal have ceased to be. Think of this, ye men of prayer. Your whisper sounded in the ear of the Almighty; and He has already acted on your cry; you have moved Him who moveth all. This is your privilege as the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. The power which you command is stronger than sin and death and hell; stronger than men and devils. Let no difficulty perplex you, but take your God and Father at his word, and cry aloud; spare not; do not let Him go until He bless you.

What would the poor human creature be without this privilege and power! What of his wants, his fears, his temptations! Try to conceive of him even inactively waiting for something which he needed, but which he had no right to ask. Could human nature bear it? Nay, verily. If man had not faith in God as the hearer of prayer, even submission to his will would be impossible, for the will of a personal God would in that case soon cease to be thought of. We should be like the philosophic heathens, who believed in a stern eternal fate long after they had ceased to put any trust in their gods. If men are to bear life well, they must do so in unison with the will of a personal God and Heavenly Father whose will, not hard law, rules the universe. "And Jesus spake a parable unto them to this end that men ought always to pray and not to faint." (See Luke xviii. 1.) Man's instincts and necessities would make him seek a devil to be lord over him, or anything rather than have hopeless, listless waiting.

Who that has known trial and difficulty, but knows the blessing of prayer? Who has habitually waited on God, and yet has never had the evidence of a granted prayer? "I love the Lord because He hath heard my voice and my supplication. I will call upon the Lord as long as I live." "This poor man cried, the Lord heard and delivered him out of all his distresses." "We would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia; that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life. But we had the sentence of death in ourselves that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God, which raiseth the dead; who delivered us from so great a death and doth deliver; in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us, ye also helping together by prayer for us, that for the gift bestowed on us by the means of many persons thanks may be given by many on our behalf." Believers in our own day have found that the best reply to theoretical objections is the blessed fact that God hears and answers their own prayers.

There are, undoubtedly, difficulties besetting this view of prayer. One difficulty in particular—a very old one, but on that account all the more noteworthy—cannot be overlooked. It is usually stated as a question: If the world is governed according to fixed laws how can prayer be effectual? Does it alter those laws? If all is fixed, what is the good of praying? It is impossible to solve the difficulty completely; but it seems to me that it is but one of the many forms of mystery presented to us by the relationship between the Creator's fore-ordination and the creature's freedom. It is not more difficult to understand how prayer can be powerful in a universe governed by fixed laws, than to understand how man is free to choose his path and free to follow it out in that same universe. It is not a difficulty of Christian theology; it is a difficulty of philosophy; pressing (so far as it is understood) upon the heathen thinker as heavily as on the Christian. The world is governed by fixed laws, and yet man, in accordance with these laws, can bring about this result or that; and I cannot see why it should be counted a thing incredible that God can do the same. For the case is this: Here are the fixed laws; there a living being—God or man; is that living being able to act, or is he swept on by these laws like a straw in the stream? Everything is fixed, but man is free; man can act; man has that consciousness of power which proves his freedom; and why then should it be thought impossible for God to work on his servant's side? If it be possible: if God is free—the God of love—will He not answer his children's cry? Is His promise to hear and help us but a lie? Is the history of His fatherly care but a fabrication? We dare not continue such questions, even to disown them. Prayer is an appointed cause in the government of God; the will of God has linked it with results as firmly as any other cause in his universe; and we can believe, both on grounds of Scripture and of experience, that prayer is power. It was said to a man of prayer, "As a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed." He was a man of "power and of love and of a sound mind" who wrote to his Christian friends in the prospect of bodily dangers, "Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me; that I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judea, and that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints; that I may come unto you with joy by the will of God, and may with you be refreshed."

To say, as some do, that God does not—cannot—answer prayer for temporal mercy, but may answer prayer for spiritual good things, is so obviously self-

[illegible] thy words . . . . O man, greatly beloved, fear not: peace be unto thee, be strong, yea be strong."

But we are sometimes told that prayer is useful, not because God answers it at all, but because of its reflex action on the mind of him who prays. This seems to mean, that when a man asks a favour of God he does not get it, but that it does his mind good to ask. For example: a man does not get daily bread though he asks for it, but it does him good to ask for it, as he thus learns to depend on God. Now without further argument, I would merely say, that it does not seem to be possible to pray unless in the expectation of an answer: that to pray merely for the sake of the reflex action is beyond the power of any human being. Let him who doubts this, try. No doubt, in this fallacy, as in most fallacies, there is a half truth; for, as we have said already, the chief object of prayer is not to secure this mercy or that, but to attain to unison with the will of God. But it is only a half truth after all, and it does not make it possible for a confiding child to ask a Father's mercy. It would make all intercessory prayer—all petitions for a blessing on those we love—an idle form. It would teach us that when "Epaphras laboured fervently for the Colossians in prayers, that they might stand perfect and complete in all the will of God," he was but an unenlightened devotee! Shall not we put aside all such vain jangling as this view would make us adopt, and bow our knees, for our friends' sakes,—as St. Paul did,—to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that He would "grant them according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with all might by his Spirit in the inner man?"

The foregoing suggests another difficulty: "Why do we pray to God to do things, which He already wills to do?" Our best answer is the fact that Christ taught us to pray "after this manner." It is the Father's will that all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth: and yet the first three petitions of the Lord's Prayer are entreaties that this may be done. And Christ himself prayed for the fulfilment of the most obvious Divine purposes. "Fear not, little flock," He had said, "it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom;" and yet at the very last we find Him praying, "Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom Thou hast given me." In the very same way though it is God's will to bless his children, He loves that his children should ask that blessing. Does not every good father like to have his children asking him to help them? Would he have them motionless, lifeless, as pieces of furniture? Is he not glad when they run to him, saying with the child's trust, "Dear father, do this for me?"

But then, if we pray for things which are according to God's revealed will, shall we expect an answer, always an answer? This is a pressing difficulty, often put in these days. God has declared it to be his will that every sinner should turn to Him and live: and if I, as a friend, pray for the conversion of a friend—as a minister, for the conversion of many of my hearers' souls, shall I be sure of an answer? The true reply is Yes. There may be exceptions, there may be cases in which our prayer is a prescribing of time and ways and means to God, who in this, as in all, knoweth best; and therefore the answer may be withheld: there may be other cases in which the special prayer, though rightly laid before God, is such that—for reasons far beyond our ken—God cannot grant it; but yet, how many more souls would be converted if friends prayed for friends, ministers and people for this result from preaching; all of us to the Lord of the harvest to send forth labourers unto his harvest! "Ye have not, because ye ask not." I think it would startle us if we really took ourselves to task about our prayers. I prayed for my brother's soul this morning. Do I expect an answer, or have I merely tried to shift a little uneasiness off me? Do I expect that the blessing will come? It is God's will—it is my wish—do I believe in the efficacy of my prayer to obtain it?

There is just one caution needed here. Let us not despair if God seem to delay long. "Thy will be done." If Thou seest that greater good would be done by delay, "Thy will be done." Suppose Stephen had prayed for the salvation of Paul's soul, was he to die unbelieving, because with his last look on earth he saw the infatuated young man holding the clothes of those who were throwing the stones? When Monica prayed for Augustine, would she have done right to despair, because he was not at once rescued from sin? Was not a better purpose served by the humility which was deepened in both mother and son through the long delay in his conversion? Had Stephen lived, he might have "glorified God in Paul" when he heard him saying, "For this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe in Him to life everlasting." However certain we are of our purpose being good; however hard it may be to bear the agony of hope deferred; still let us ever leave our case in God's hands, nor impiously presume to dictate times and ways and means to Him. Sometimes we are impatient, and mistake our impatience for the eagerness of faith; sometimes presumptuous, and mistake our presumption for childlike confidence. We need oftentimes the lesson of the prophet's prayer, and the "Go again seven times;" the lesson of the Psalmist's injunction, "Wait on the Lord, and he will strengthen thine heart; wait, I say, on the Lord."

There is such a thing as the misfortune of a granted prayer, of a successful wish; for prayer may become its own punishment. You remember Rachel's presumptuous cry, "Give me children, or I die," and the issue when God gave her children, and she died in giving one birth. So many a man has prayed for success in his ambition, and found in the success the ruin of his peace, or of his soul. I have known a mother, who prayed, as though her heart would break, for longer life to her sick child, and her prayer was granted; but long years afterwards, when the reprobate youth was literally breaking her heart, she wished he had died in his cradle when he was pure and good. We know so little, we can foresee so little, that it is never safe for us to make our prayer merely a cry for the fulfilment of our own shortsighted desires.

Once more: There is a promise, "If two of you shall agree as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven." I have had it put to me as a difficulty that there is an absolute promise to the prayer of one, and that therefore there seems to be no possibility of more power belonging to the united prayer of two. I do not think it is enough to say that if the prayer of one is heard and answered, there must be still greater power in the petitions of two or three—of a Christian assembly. The emphatic word is "agree," and the promise is given to remind us that we are apt to pray without due submission to the will of God, to put our momentary cares more pressingly before God than our abiding needs, and that there is a check on this tendency in the agreement of two disciples. Each feels his personal selfishness displaced by higher cravings when he seeks to pray for those things which they both need; and thus they unite in seeking those holy things and good which it is God's will to give. Let us not forget also how blessed is the comfort this gives to those who in their trouble have found a sympathising friend ready to pray with and for them in their house of mourning, or by the bed of sickness. The pressure of the great need makes a heartfelt agreement, and that prayer will be heard.

Think, then, what is missed by the prayerless man. No need to suppose him more afflicted than the prayerful, suppose the same trials to come upon them; but one bears them in God's strength, the other is either broken down or hardened into insensibility by them. Terrible is the lot of the man who bears the burden of mortality—and of immortality—unlightened, unshared. What a privilege, on the other hand, has the man of prayer! We shall not speak of it as our duty—God's right; but as our privilege—God's boon.

You who read this paper, do you pray? Do you feel that it is a high, a priceless privilege to be warranted to pray? If not, if you pray without finding it a privilege, see what is the cause. You may find prayer irksome because you go to God with a certain round of petitions, irrespective of your feelings and desires. You might as well put slips of prayer in a box, and turn the handle as the Buddhist does, and fancy it is prayer. Do not express wants which you do not feel; do not ask for all the Christian graces when you do not wish to have them. Ask things needful; milk if you be a babe, strong meat if you be of mature strength in Christ. Think what you want before you begin to pray; ask for it, and then stop. You kill your spirit of prayer when you do anything else. If you shall find upon examination that in reality you do not wish piety, purity, or present salvation from the power of sin, is it not better to know this than to mock God and hurt your own soul by asking what you have no desire to get?

A. H. Charteris.

THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH.

BY THE REV. J. H. RIGG, D.D.

In my two former papers, one on "God's Day," the other on "The Old Testament Sabbath in Theory and Practice," * I hope that the following important points have been settled.

1. There is no alternative between upholding the Sabbath of the Decalogue, as still virtually binding on Christians, and regarding the Lord's Day as merely a Church festival. This latter alternative will not warrant any legislative defence of the day from desecration; and it may well be doubted whether, on merely economical grounds, the nation would consent to a legislative consecration of the day to rest.

2. The principle of the Sabbath-law was a part of primitive and patriarchal morality; and, as an integral portion of the Decalogue, the Fourth Commandment is to be distinguished altogether from the merely ceremonial and temporary enactments of the Mosaic code. The Decalogue, quâ Decalogue, according to our Lord and St. Paul, is a part of Christianity; and therefore the Fourth Commandment is binding upon Christians. Moreover, our Saviour has separately and explicitly vindicated the permanency and universal obligation of the Sabbath by his own ever-memorable word, "The Sabbath was made for man."

3. From all which (1 and 2) it follows that so long as this world of toil and care remains what it is, the law of the Sabbath must still abide as an essential part of Christianity.

4. At the same time it is the spirit of the commandment which is to be kept in view, and which must govern the letter. So it was even under the law, as in the case of the priests in the temple. So our Lord explained that it ought to be throughout all the claims and relations of life. So it must be in the Christian dispensation, with yet larger allowance for difficulties in the way of its literal fulfilment, arising from a state of social life, and from ecclesiastical conditions and necessities, altogether in contrast with those which existed among the Jewish people. But the spirit of the commandment will never become obsolete. One day in seven, for rest, for family intercourse and union, and for Divine worship;—that is the meaning of the commandment. Rest for the body. No such amount of work can be allowed, except in an extraordinary case of imperative necessity, as really destroys the character of the day as one of rest; nothing which makes it a weary day, or a day of task-work. All such work, however, is to be allowed as is needful to make the day one of true happiness, all, the prohibition of which would involve such inconvenience, or privation, or irksomeness, as to render the enforced abstinence from active exertion much more wearying and unpleasant, more disturbing to the spirit, than would be the performance of the work prohibited: this further guard, at the same time, being ever kept in mind, that no such work may, as a rule, or except in some case of pressing emergency and imperative necessity, be allowed, as prevents the due consecration of the day, taken as a whole, to spiritual culture and Divine worship as its highest employment. The direct demand of the law, however, is not only that bodily rest, but also that mental repose should be religiously observed. "Thou shalt do no manner of work," prohibits care as well as toil, the task-work of the mind as well as of the body. In truth, the toil and task-work of the mind must ever be also the toil and task-work of the body. But, further, the law demands rest of body and of mind, only for the sake of body, soul, and spirit. The rest is to be for the body's sake, and, therefore, must be such rest as is consistent with a good measure of sober bodily refreshment and enjoyment. The rest is for the sake of family intercourse and union, and must therefore be so defined and measured as to be in consistency with the conditions of family union, and, in a right sense, of family festivity, including in the scope of the word family, servants as well as children. Above all, the rest is to be for the sake of, that which is the highest and happiest privilege and enjoyment of the day, spiritual meditation and fellowship and Divine worship. If, for the sake of this, some active exertion be needful, activity to that extent must become a duty; such activity being, in truth, necessary in order to the best, the deepest, the truest rest. Thus understanding the Sabbath law, all is brought into harmony; bodily and mental rest, family union and intercourse, Divine worship. The rest is in order to the family fellowship and the holy worship. The family fellowship is sanctified by worship; the family union is crowned by united worship in the "great congregation," and around the family altar.

Such is the ideal of the Sabbath Institute, in its general principles, which should, as I venture to think, be kept in view by the Christian. As thus presented, that ideal seems to be equally in harmony with the Old Testament and with the New. Thus understood, it may surely be maintained that the Fourth Commandment is still in force.

The one difficulty, of any importance, which seems to stand in the way of the universal acceptance by Christian people of the Sabbath law, as it has now been expounded, is the fact that the day has been changed; that the Lord's Day is the first day of the week, whereas the Sabbath was the seventh day.

As to the history of this change, as we allege, of the day only,—as those from whom we differ maintain, of the day and the principle of its observance, of the day and the day's authority, both at once; as to the history of the change by which, as all agree, the Lord's Day has come to be observed by Christians, in a Christian spirit and manner, instead of the Jewish Sabbath, as celebrated on the seventh day after the Jewish manner;—I shall not waste time and space by dwelling upon points which both parties are well agreed,—Scotch Free Churchmen, and English High Churchmen; Dr. Candlish and Dr. Hessey. I shall assume it as settled beyond the need of argument, that the anniversary of the Lord's Resurrection was, from the very first, kept as a Christian festival, a special day of worship and thanksgiving. The last Sabbath before the Resurrection had been a sad day for the disciples—the saddest they ever knew; it was the day on which our Saviour lay in the tomb, a dark, hopeless day. The first day of the week saw the sunrise of the Christian dispensation; and could not but be commemorated ever afterwards as the anniversary of the "new creation," the beginning of a new and brighter world, of the reign of redemption and grace, under the headship of the risen Lord. The believers, on the day of the Lord's Resurrection, could not but say, "This is the day that the Lord hath made; let us rejoice and be glad in it."

There is no need of evidence to prove that the first day of the week, the day of our Lord's resurrection, was from the first the festival of the disciples, and so became the festival of Christianity. This was of necessity. He who cannot see this has eyes for no living truth. If our hearts have taken truly in the life and truth of that Christian "hour of prime," the time of the first life-burst of Christianity, we shall not expect to find, either in the Gospels or the Acts, an announcement of this as a fact, or the register of a decree by which the acceptance of the Christian festival was enacted. But we shall expect to find such instances and allusions as imply the fact. And herein we are not disappointed. On the first day of the week our Lord once and again met his disciples, when they were assembled together for fellowship and worship. On the first day of the week the primitive Christians came together to hold their brotherly feasts (agapæ) and to celebrate the Lord's Supper (to "break bread"). On the first day of the week they were trained to "lay by in store" as God had prospered them, and the first day came to be called, as in the first chapter of the Apocalypse, "the Lord's Day," and was the season on which, above all, the Lord's saints had spiritual communion with Him.

In the age immediately following that of the Apostles we have decisive evidence that the Lord's Day had come into the place of the Sabbath, so far, at least, that the Sabbath had ceased to be observed, while the Lord's Day was kept as a holy day; that on this day the solemn and stated assemblies of Christians were held; that the Lord's Day had come to be spoken of by preachers and teachers as the Sabbath, and its celebration as the Sabbath-keeping.*

"But," it is objected "the Christian Jews, at least at first, observed the Jewish Sabbath, after the Jewish manner; they also kept the Lord's Day; it is not easy to believe that they abstained from labour on both days: therefore their celebration of the Lord's Day, at any rate, cannot have been of the same sort as their observance of the Sabbath." So much as this we must concede; but the point is of no essential importance in the argument. Doubtless with the Christian Jews the Sabbath itself must have been changed into a Christian holy day. They would remember the sacrifice, and could not but remember also its acceptance; they would remember the burial during the Sabbath; they could not choose but also remember the Resurrection. In a word, the Jewish Sabbath, as they could not now but keep that Sabbath, was changed into a Christian festival, and would prepare them for keeping the Christian Lord's Day. All through its hours they must have been longing for the glad holy day which was to follow; and thus, when the eve of the Sabbath closed, and sunset ushered in the beginning of the first day of the week, they would be prepared to hail with joy its memories and its services, and look forward with longing for the earliest day-break of the Resurrection-morning. On that day, so long as their Jewish commonwealth remained, and as respects the believing Jews of Palestine at least, they would not abstain from work. But yet it would be a high and holy day, from the first, for the services of which they had been prepared by the Sabbath-rest. They could not but feel that it was destined to increase, while their Sabbath must decrease; that the rightful inheritance of sanctity and celebration belonged to it, and must come to it. They could not but be led by their spiritual instincts to anticipate that substitution of the Lord's Day for the Jewish Sabbath, with the full rights of inheritance, which could not but follow.

In the nature of things, however, this was a matter not to be settled by a decree, but to be determined by a law of inward life and sympathy.

In this, as in other things, the Jewish Christian occupied of necessity a territory of transition. The dilemma which I have been endeavouring to resolve does not apply to the case of the Sabbath only; the sacrifices, the temple services, the passover, circumcision, all are instances of a similar difficulty. The Jewish Christian kept the Passover, and yet he celebrated continually the Eucharist, which was destined and intended to supersede it. His children were circumcised, and also baptised. He took part in the temple sacrifices, and yet he knew that the sacrificial institute had found its fulfilment in the death of Christ, and he soon learnt that it was in a few years to pass away. All these rites, the Sabbath included, i.e., as a seventh-day Sabbath, were among the number of those which were "decaying and waxing old," and which, as we are taught in the epistle to the Hebrews, were accordingly "ready to vanish away." All, notwithstanding, were observed by the Jews, at least of Palestine, so long as the temple stood. But, as the light and life of Christianity filled them more and more, they learnt and felt that these were but parts of an obsolete economy; they interpreted and used them in a Christian sense; they had given them up in spirit while they still observed their letter; and they were prepared to welcome with all their hearts the clear and full Christian dispensation, when these shadows should have passed away, and only the spiritual substance should remain. As, therefore, the Eucharist was to supersede the Paschal celebration and the temple sacrifices; as baptism was to take the place of circumcision; so the Lord's Day was to come into the place of the Jewish Sabbath.

* Neander's "Church History," vol. i. pp. 402-3.

In the meantime, there were doubtless Jewish Christians out of Palestine, who, before the destruction of the Jewish commonwealth, learnt, in the spirit of St. Paul, to understand that the glory had passed from the Jewish seventh day, and had settled on the Christian first day ;* as, on the contrary, there were Gentile converts, and converted Jewish proselytes, who, out of respect for the Jewish law, and the letter of the Old Testament, not only celebrated the Lord's Day after a Christian sort, but strictly kept the Jewish Sabbath. In regard to all such, the great apostle of liberty and of tolerance taught, in his large-hearted way, that "he that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord ; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it." (Rom. xiv. 6.)

"But," it may be rejoined by an objector, "granting all that has now been advanced, it is yet admitted that the Lord's Day was not at first, by the Jews at least, kept strictly after the Sabbatical fashion. It must also be admitted that of the early Christians a large number were slaves, and that they could not strictly keep the Lord's Day as a Sabbath. On the whole, therefore, so far as can be judged from these two circumstances, conjointly, it appears certain that the truly primitive Christians did not sabbatically observe the Lord's Day. In fact, Jewish Christians, converted Jewish proselytes, and Gentile slaves, taken together, must have constituted so large a proportion of the early Church that their rule of observance may fairly be taken as the general rule."

As respects the Jews, what I have already said has gone to show that they kept their own Sabbath in a Christian spirit, as well as according to the Jewish letter, and carried its celebration over and on to the crowning grace and gladness of the first day. They, therefore, observed the Fourth Commandment, and had all the benefit of a full Christian Sabbath ; while they were preparing the way for the succession of the Lord's Day into the place of their seventh-day Sabbath. And, as respects the Christian slaves, the fact that they could not, and consequently did not, keep the Sabbath strictly, is little to the purpose of those who advance it. That their desire was for a holy rest-day may be taken for granted. The example of the Jewish Decalogue must have suggested the thought to them. The practice of the Jews around must have given it emphasis. Their sense of the superiority of the Lord's Day, in glory and privilege, must have led them to desire to show at least as much reverence for that day as the Jews showed for their Sabbath, and to do it at least as much honour. Their own necessities, the cravings of their hearts, must have taught them how precious and desirable a Christian day of rest would be to them. It cannot be doubted that they longed for such a day. As little can it be doubted how they would have employed such a day. They would have consecrated it, would have celebrated and employed it "unto the Lord." It would have been for them eminently a day of holy gladness and of Church privilege. All that remains of Christian antiquity agrees in teaching us with what solemn gladness Christian festivals were observed by the primitive Christians. No masques, or mummeries, or games, we may be sure, would they have set forth, no Lord's Day revels. We know that within some eighty years of the Resurrection, the Christians "were accustomed to assemble before daylight on an appointed day, and alternately among themselves to chant a hymn to Christ as God ;"* that they bound themselves solemnly to each other to walk in the ways of godliness ; and that in the evening they assembled again to partake of their Church feast, and of the Lord's Supper. Such is the information given by Pliny the younger respecting the Lord's Day keeping of the primitive Christians. And the tendency which, from the beginning, ruled in the heart of the Christians is manifested by the result, by the universal sacred observance of the day, which grew up within the early Church, and of which Constantine's celebrated edict, although it bears the marks of a degeneracy which had already set in, was yet the evidence and the result. In truth, we have the distinct testimony of Tertullian that the Christians of his day observed the Lord's Day sacredly as a Sabbath, uniting with their Christian festivity a religious abstinence from their ordinary business.†

It is not generally known that the case of the Christian slaves during the first ages of the Church's history has its precise parallel in the case of the Christian slaves in our own West India colonies, previous to the passing of the Emancipation Act. For very many years these slaves, the most pious as well as the heathen, were compelled to go to market on the Lord's Day morning. That was the only time when their owners permitted them to go ; the only time when there was any market for them to go to. But then they went to and fro, keeping the Sabbath in their souls, "singing and making melody in their hearts unto the Lord." And as soon as ever they could, as soon as liberty came to them, most gladly and thankfully did they escape from this odious part of their bondage ; they went to market on other days, and they gave the whole Sabbath to religious rest and to worship. Here was the principle of the Fourth Commandment ; and they who have religion seated in their hearts will not need to be told to abstain, and to provide that their dependents may abstain, as far as possible, from all bodily labour on the Christian Holy Day, that so their whole energies may be devoted on that day to His service.

Those from whom we differ on this subject seem to forget that the Old Testament Scriptures were from the first reverenced as divine and authoritative in the primitive Christian Church. St. Paul, whether in the Epistle to the Hebrews, or elsewhere, teaches that the law has been superseded only where and to what extent it has been fulfilled by Christianity in its highest and ultimate meaning. Wherever, as in the case of the ceremonial ordinances, its meaning and intent have been realised in Christianity in a far higher sense, the spiritual taking the place of the typical, there it becomes out of date and is done away; but only there. All else abides. In this "all else" is included, as I showed fully in my last paper, the moral law, the Decalogue. In the grand abiding substance of Old Testament truth were also included the volumes of prophecy. Such being the case, the Christian Church cannot be supposed to have regarded the Sabbath Law as repealed. The early Churches had not learnt to regard as without force or obligation for them, all that is so earnestly and impressively said by Isaiah and Ezekiel respecting the sanctity of God's Sabbaths. The Old Testament was their Bible, before they had a New Testament, at least complete in form. As inevitably as the blazoning of the Ten Commandments at the east end of our English churches has begotten, and could not but beget, in the minds of English people, a reverence for the Sabbath and the Sabbath Law, so, in the case of the primitive Christian Churches, the veneration with which they regarded the Scriptures of the Old Testament, making them, as the Apostles and our Lord had done, the fountain of evidence and authority, and the ground of obligation, must have produced a reverence for the Divine authority of the Sabbath Law. At the same time, their deepest sympathies as Christian believers would teach the Christians of the first ages that most fitly and rightfully had the Apostles, under the inspiration of the Lord, transferred the glory and authority of the seventh-day Sabbath to the first day, the Lord's Day. As in baptism they saw circumcision, and in the Eucharist "the feast" of the Christian Passover, so in the Lord's Day they at once hailed the Christian Sabbath. And surely every feeling of their hearts would prompt them to say, "Our Lord's Day Sabbath shall not be counted worthy of less observance or less honour than the Jewish Sabbath." How completely the ideas of the Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Lord's Day had come to be amalgamated, to coalesce, even so early as the time of Justin Martyr, is evident from the fact that that father says that the Lord's Day was celebrated, not only as the remembrancer of our Lord's Resurrection, but also in commemoration of the creation. So also, much earlier than Justin, as I have already had occasion to note, so eminent a representative of the most ancient post-apostolic Christianity as Ignatius, teaches us that the Jewish Sabbath had given place to the Christian Lord's Day; while, in perfect agreement with Ignatius and Justin, and only a little later than Justin, Irenæus, the disciple of Polycarp, describes the Sabbath-keeping of the Christians in these words:—"On the Lord's Day, every one of us Christians keeps the Sabbath, meditating in the law, and rejoicing in the works of God."* If to these evidences of the very early identification of the Sabbath Law with the rule of the Lord's Day, there be added the witness of Tertullian, already quoted, respecting the strict sanctity with which the Lord's Day was kept free from work and care, the proof would seem to be complete that, in the grave and solemn times of the martyr-age of Christianity, the Lord's Day was by devout Christians observed according to the principle of the Fourth Commandment. I have already, indeed, shown some reasons why it may be admitted that, at the very first, in all likelihood the Lord's Day was but loosely observed. The Jewish believers, who kept the seventh day holy, and the slaves, who were not at liberty on any day to rest from their labour, together formed a large proportion of many of the earliest Churches. Besides which, newly converted heathens, who had had no previous acquaintance with the Jewish Scriptures, although they might have received the true quickening leaven and life of Christianity into their souls, might not for some time be made so familiar with the teaching and spirit of "the law and the prophets" as to apprehend the force and obligation of the Fourth Commandment, as in its spirit applying to the Lord's Day. It must be borne in mind, also, that among these there would at first be no adequate body of resident and thoroughly instructed Christian teachers. Moreover, the whole life of the world was at that time against the strictly literal observance of the Fourth Commandment. The Jews, indeed, kept their Sabbath in Gentile lands; but, in order to do this, they were compelled to separate and seclude themselves in all their domestic life and economy from the world in which they lived. This was not inconsistent with the exclusive character of the Jewish dispensation. But it was altogether inconsistent with the character of Christianity. Christians were not to "go out of the world." They were to be a leaven in the midst of it. Hence it was not possible for a few Christian converts here and there, themselves poor and without influence, so to alter the whole course of the life in the midst of which they were called to the knowledge of Jesus, as to secure for themselves an absolute rest on one day in seven. All these considerations taken together serve to show why, at the very first, the Fourth Commandment could not be perfectly observed by Christian converts.

* "In the 'Epistle of Ignatius to the Magnesians,'" says Neander, "it is pre-supposed that even the Jews who had come over to Christianity, substituted Sunday in place of the Sabbath."

The Sabbath Law, in its Mosaic form, was given emphatically as a national law; and never can it be perfectly carried out, even for the blessing of individuals, except where a nation, as such, has accepted it, and is agreed to live according to it.

But all this argues nothing against the obligation or the blessing of the Sabbath. It remains still the duty of each individual to keep it, as far as is in his power. We cannot argue from the ill-informedness of raw and recent Gentile converts, that those who have been brought up in the full light of the whole Bible are to be released from the obligations of the Holy Commandments. On the contrary, the circumstances by which those from whom we differ prove that the Sabbath could not be kept at first, are our justification in this part of our argument. It was not strictly kept, we admit, because it could not be, and only because it could not be. That it was, so far as it could be, and so far as a true spiritual illumination prevailed, is shown by the strictness with which, notwithstanding all the difficulties in the way, all the earnest Christians of the second century—whether in the East, as represented by Ignatius and Justin, or in the West, as represented by Irenæus, or in Africa, as represented by Tertullian—were agreed to observe it. Doubtless, indeed, the allegorising and lax school of Alexandria imported some elements of laxity into the interpretation of the Sabbath Law, although Origen's ideal of a perfect Lord's Day Sabbath-keeping would appear to have been very high and spiritual. It is likely, also, that as the Christian Church became wealthier and more infected with the worldliness of a corrupt and degenerate empire, all its observances, and its observance of the Sabbath in particular, would become increasingly lax and formal. Still, on the whole, as Christianity grew in sway and extent, a progressive outward sanctity distinguished the Lord's Day from the other days of the seven; and if the decree of Constantine betrays some points of growing laxity, it nevertheless is manifestly grounded, in good part, on the idea, the principle, of Sabbath sanctity, as embodied in the Decalogue.

But, after all, we refuse to be bound by the precedent of the early ages as to the observance of the day. If it be shown that the observance of the Patristic Church was lax, that will not affect us. Their interpretation, their exegesis, was lax. In some things even their morals were lax. They admitted pious frauds. Their sensibility was not keenly alive to the guilt of sensual sins. They could not lose all at once all the slime of heathenish sensuality and falsehood. Are we to go back to their exegesis or their morals? Nay, we have the Scriptures, and we interpret the sacred text and expound its morality for ourselves. In many respects our interpretation is truer than that of the early Church. The Apostles held the truth; but they could only launch it into the world in the form of general principles or statements; and they launched it into the midst of heathenish contamination. By the Apostles we abide in our interpretation. By the practice of the early Church, even of the Apostolic or sub-Apostolic Church, we are not bound to abide.

We hold that the observance of the Sabbath was intended to grow more spiritually strict as the ages advanced; and that, even as to literal strictness, we have many advantages and inducements which never existed at any period or in any part of the world during the patristic or the mediæval ages. We hold, moreover, that the law was meant not only for the private guidance of individuals, but for the legislative direction of the nation. Never was the Sabbath Law so necessary for nations and individuals as at this day. Never could it be, never ought it to have been, so spiritually and worthily observed. In literal strictness, we cannot keep it as the Jews did; but we may hallow it in a higher sense and with a more perfect and blessed rest of heart and soul than they did or could. The mere letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. If its law is interpreted and applied as has been already explained in these papers, the truth of our Lord's words will shine out with ever-increasing glory, and it will be more and more acknowledged that "the Sabbath was made for man."

On such grounds as have now been indicated, I trust we may still hold by the harmony of the Old and the New Testaments, of the moral law and the gospel of Christ. It will not be necessary, as I hope, to expunge the Decalogue from our catechisms, or to erase the emblazoned Commandments from the walls of our churches; which, however, would evidently be necessary—necessary as a dictate equally of morals and of policy, if the Decalogue, quâ Decalogue, were indeed obsolete and repealed. I trust we may still hold that the Fourth Commandment embodies the fundamental law of the Sabbath, the Christian Sabbath no less than the Jewish. The mere change of the day, it is admitted by the candid among our opponents, is not an essential element of the question. If we keep the first day as the seventh, we are still keeping the seventh day holy; each seventh day in succession and one seventh of our days. That the same day, literally, should be kept holy by all the nations of the earth, we know to be a physical impossibility. For reasons which I have endeavoured to make plain in this paper, a decree at a given time changing the holy day from the seventh to the first was not to be expected. The law of sympathy and life, under the continual influence of "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation," was to effect the transfer to the festival of our Lord's Resurrection of all the honour, homage, and sanctity which had belonged to the ancient Sabbath. The transfer was, as we have seen, thus effected. With this transfer has come for us a change in the centre to which we gravitate. Jehovah the Creator has become for us Jehovah the Redeemer.

> "'Twas great to speak a world from nought,
> 'Twas greater to redeem."

Accordingly, as without the record of a decree, we (at least most of us) believe in the apostolic authority of Infant Baptism, and the universal obligation upon Christians of the Holy Eucharist; so, though there be no record of any decree on the subject, we believe in the divine authority of the Lord's Day, and its obligation on Christians, as virtually identical with the Sabbath of the old covenant.

Dr. Hessey thinks that the authority by which Christians are bound to observe the Lord's Day is equivalent to that by which the rite of Confirmation is sanctioned! To this level, as I believe, must our ideas of the sanctity of the Lord's Day descend when once we cease to regard it as identical with the Old Testament Sabbath. It must come down to the style and title of a mere Church festival, a festival of merely ecclesiastical authority. And then, how much longer can any shadow of Sabbath sanctity or any pretence of a Sabbath Law be kept up in this land? How soon, after that conclusion has been adopted, will the glory, the defence, the consolation, of the British Sabbath be departed; and all that is included in the thought of a Sabbath at Paris or Berlin come in instead?

It has been many times and most impressively shown, especially in the Prize Essays on the Sabbath by Working Men, published some fourteen years ago, and in Mr. Arthur's Letter to Lord Stanley, that on the Sabbaths of Great Britain, most of all, depends all that is most stable in our national character, all that is most precious in our domestic habits and feelings, the peculiar vein of sweetness which tempers the ruggedness of our insular temper, the thoughtfulness and the moral superiority which distinguish the better classes of Britons beyond any people in the world. A Sabbathless nation, in the midst of an age of fierce competition, must be a nation without leisure for love or for thought—a nation without rest and without homes. The people of a Sabbathless land, at all events in such an age, must live in a condition of perilous alternation between the driving drudgery of business and the driving dissipation of pleasure. A people and a land in such a case must be open to the accesses of revolutionary excitement; a Sabbathless people must be incompetent for that noble responsibility of self-government, which has been so long one of the great distinctions of the English nation. Calm and strong religious conviction and feeling can never be enthroned in the heart of a Sabbathless people. I may not dwell on this subject, as my space is already exhausted, and as the special object of these papers is substantially accomplished. But it would have been inexcusable not to glance at that practical and popular argument for the sanctity of the Sabbath which many feel to be, of itself, a solid and satisfactory ground on which to rest our faith in the Sabbath Law.

The one thing which, perhaps most of all, needs to be eliminated from our idea of the object of the Sabbath Institute, is that which so many desire to put into it—that, namely, of pleasure. If mere pleasure be admitted as one part of the end of the Sabbath, work cannot be excluded from the day. Work must always be a better thing, and a better thing on any day, than very much which men deem pleasure. No day can be held sacred for the ends of pleasure. If pleasure, merely as such, be recognised as lawful on the Sabbath, labour cannot be proscribed as unlawful. Labour, indeed, may be lawful on the Sabbath, as we have so plainly seen, for certain objects and to a certain extent. I may work, or demand work, for reasons of necessity or of mercy; but I may not exact work for my mere pleasure. Mere pleasure, for mere pleasure's sake, can be no part of Sabbath duty, and ought to be no part of a Christian's Sabbath.

There can be no greater fallacy than to confound pleasure with rest. Pleasure is not necessarily rest; though rest may be pleasure. Pleasure is often the most severe labour. Nothing fatigues like the dissipation of pleasure. Labour and travelling, for necessary purposes, may be defended; but not for the mere pleasure of any class or of any man. Pleasure traffic on the Lord's Day is, on every ground of Christian principle and of good policy, indefensible. Labour on the large or the small scale is only to be justified on the grounds already so often indicated. It must be in order to rest, in order to family union and intercourse, in order to worship. If limited to this, it will never press heavily on any class of employés, but all may, in a fair measure and Christian sense, enjoy their Sabbaths. To apply these principles to the leading questions of modern times, in regard to the employment of labour on the Sabbath, would be a profitable task, but cannot now be entered upon. There are few, if any, questions, however, which, by a clear, unprejudiced, resolute mind, might not, with these principles as a key, be resolved. The conclusions might probably offend in more directions than one; but upon their being distinctly seen and honestly acted out, will depend more for Christianity and for Britain than many think.

ON KING SAUL: A STUDY.

I.

THERE is no more tragic story in the Bible than that of Saul. We follow the rapid scenes of his life with breathless interest from the time when the son of Kish stood before the shouting multitude, "higher than any of the people from his shoulder and upwards," to the time when the Lord's anointed, tottering on the brink of ruin, and forsaken by his prophetic counsellor, disguised himself, and said to his servants, "Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go to her and inquire of her."

Saul mounted the throne of Israel under the brightest auspices; for although the people had shown want of faith in demanding a king, seeing that the Lord God was their king, it does not appear that any blame was attached to Saul when he accepted the crown. On the contrary, he was solemnly chosen by the prophet Samuel, and again re-elected by the nation at large; so that he ruled with a double sanction,—by Divine right and by the will of the people. Oh! that we might dwell upon this bright opening "ere the sun comes with years."

How the old prophet Samuel, when he beheld the humility of the young man Saul, who "had hid himself"—when he beheld the obedience of the young man Saul, who nevertheless "came forth" at the bidding of the people—how the old prophet must have rejoiced in his heart over the Lord's anointed!

"See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen, that there is none like him among all the people? And all the people shouted, and said, God save the king!"

An incident soon happened which brought out the warlike character of the new king. As he was returning home he heard one of those lamentations in the city of Gibeah such as mark in Eastern towns the arrival of a great calamity.* It was the threat issued by Nahash, king of Ammon, to put out the right eyes of all the inhabitants if they did not consent to be his slaves. This fell like a spark on the dormant spirit of Saul. "The Spirit of the Lord came upon him," as on the judges of old. The shy retiring nature vanished, never to return; a summons went forth to assemble the people; three hundred thousand men of war followed, and Jabesh Gilead was rescued.

* Dean Stanley—"Dictionary of the Bible," Art. Saul; to which the reader is referred generally.

II.

The king now turned his victorious arms against the Philistines, who infested the land. The whole Philistine nation rose against him. The old terror came back upon the Israelites: they did not dare to face their enemies: many concealed themselves in the caverns, many crossed the Jordan: all were disarmed, except Saul and his son Jonathan with their immediate retainers. The first panic over, the people reassembled themselves. Ashamed of their cowardice, they felt that the destinies of Israel and the safety of their king were at stake. They were on the eve of a great battle. The prophet Samuel was expected daily, almost hourly, to arrive. Nothing must be done without God's sanction. The words of Samuel had been "Seven days shalt thou tarry till I come to thee, and show thee what thou shalt do." The seven days were nearly passed, but Samuel came not: at last, on the seventh day, the king could wait no longer. He offered the sacrifices himself, and was preparing to go to battle, when Samuel arrived, and pronounced the first curse on his impetuous zeal.

Up to that time his life had run smoothly: he had not fallen, for he had not been tempted; but there came a time in his life, as there comes a time in the life of each one of us, when God sent to prove him,—and at the first trial he broke down. You may think his fault a light one; you may say, better go to battle with prayer than without any prayer; but you will observe his crime was the spirit which makes all prayer worthless—the spirit of impatience and irritability, which wants to twist the will of God into accordance with our own, instead of bending ours to it. God asked for faith and patience. Saul had no faith, no patience. He could not tarry the Lord's leisure—he could not do God's will; he wanted to do his own. But still he could not divest himself suddenly of his conscience. Was not a compromise possible? Could he not serve God and mammon too? The attempt was at least worth making; and so he took the matter into his own hands, and did sacrifice for himself. The moment after, doubtless, his heart smote him—smote him although he went forth with a smile to meet Samuel—smote him, although one excuse after another rose glibly to his lips—smote him when the prophet's voice rang forth with the ominous inquiry, "What hast thou done?"

III.

From this moment we may date the downward progress of the unhappy king. We may notice, too, the first appearance of his madness in the rash vow which almost cost him the life of Jonathan.

Outwardly, everything continued to prosper. The Philistines were driven from the land, the king's popularity increased daily, the splendour of his court surpassed all that had been seen up to that time in Israel. Nothing was there to show that the new heart which God had given to the king was changing, and that the glory was even then departing from Israel! It was so with Saul,—it may be so with us. The work of death may go on silently within us for years, and outwardly all may be calm.

You may gaze upon the shining levels of the summer sea, and nothing there will betray the slimy creatures which revel and crawl beneath.

But the spirit of a life cannot always be hid; that "blot upon the brain will show itself without;" the faithless heart, the palsied feelings, the soul dying to God, and love, and purity—think you such a process can go on within, and leave no traces, for ever? Believe it not. There may be a coat of many colours spread without, but the poison will eat through in time. Would you know the plague spots of that inner death? They are the harsh words spoken yesterday, the impure converse, the cruel bitter sneer which stung, and was meant to sting, the great listlessness and fatigue which is stealing over your life, the want of interest in your work, of interest in your brethren, of interest in your God, the open blasphemy, the covert shame! Where these are there is death, and there is hell. Noisome things creep about the chambers of the heart, devils' voices whisper in the ear, glittering lies dazzle and seduce:—blind eyes! deaf ears! stony heart! open to sin!—blind, deaf, passionless to God!

We might expect to find something of all this in the life of Saul. We do find it. A straw will show which way the stream is flowing; the current of Saul's life had been setting downwards. His actions appear like straws upon the surface. Again the occasion rises for obedience; again the king fails. The command was, "Destroy Amalek, root and branch!" Saul saved the king and some of the spoil. Again the prophet meets him with a rebuke:—"Wherefore didst thou not obey the voice of the Lord?" Again the bold and glib rejoinder; but this time reiterated with an air of injured innocence, which marks the increasing deterioration of the king's character: "Yea, I have obeyed the voice of the Lord, and have gone the way which the Lord sent me, and have brought Agag the king of Amalek, and have utterly destroyed the Amalekites."

The curse follows, and the struggle between Samuel and Saul in their final parting is indicated by the rent of Samuel's robe as he tears himself away from the grasp of Saul. "Then Samuel went to Ramah; and Saul went up to his house to Gibeah of Saul. And Samuel came no more to see Saul until the day of his death: nevertheless, Samuel mourned for Saul: and the Lord repented that he had made Saul king over Israel."

IV.

The rest of Saul's life is one long tragedy. The frenzy which had appeared before at intervals, now seemed to take entire possession of him. "The Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him." The darkness grows apace. Cares of state and perils of the sword increase upon him, but he can go no more to God; doubts and terrors gather over his mind. By night he is haunted with evil dreams. The ring and clash of war is in his slumbers, the fear of treachery is about his pillow, he sleeps with a long spear by his side.

Morning breaks on the weary and restless monarch; he rises in gloom and despondency to toil through another day. He is growing unfit for war, the prey of every fitful passion, his nerves seem hopelessly shaken. In this crisis David is recommended to him, and when the dark mood comes upon him, he tries to drive it away with the strains of sweetest music; for a time he seems to succeed, but nothing can really fill the soul which God has left. When David is gone the fit comes back with redoubled violence, and at last even David cannot stay the frenzy of the king.

Know you aught of this madness? Is your religion going or gone? Is your house empty, swept, and garnished? Are you, who have seen a gleam of better things—you, who have longed for a better life, who have felt within you the stirrings of immortality—are you slipping back into the outer darkness? The chill breath of the grave is on your cheek, the cold apathy of death reigns in the lone palaces of your soul; you fly to the world, you whip the jaded senses to their work; but your laughter is hollow, and your joy comes not with the morning; you try to light up your dreary prison-house with the fires of earth and the phantasmagoria of sin, but the torches fade beneath your touch and the visions vanish away: you fill your halls with music and your life with noise, you cast your javelin like Saul at every object that offends you, but the Spirit of the Lord is departed from you!

V.

But the lingering love of good never wholly dies. Saul had fallen low, but the silken threads of human affection still bound him to the better life. He never wholly lost his love for David. We read "He loved him greatly;" "Saul would let him go no more home to his father's house." It is thus God holds us back to the uttermost—it is thus he places our fellow-creatures between us and ruin! Have you never felt this, too?—have you never been deterred from sin by the entreaty of a wife, a sister, a mother?—have you never owned the influence of a friend when the love of God could not bind you? It is well so; but if that is all, it is not enough, for human affection alone cannot stay the ruin of a human spirit! The love soon turns to indifference, the indifference to hate. Where God is not, all is unstable. Our feelings change like gusts of wind upon the ocean. And thus it happened with Saul. He was no longer fit to govern, and the monarchy which he had raised up "broke down under the weakness of its head."

And then comes the last act in this mournful tragedy. The Philistines re-entered the country, and occupied the plain of Esdraelon; on Mount Gilboa was the Israelite army, clinging as usual to the heights and precipitous passes. It was near the spring of Gideon's encampment, called the spring of Harod, or "trembling"; "and now the name assumed an evil omen, and the heart of the king trembled exceedingly." His ancient nerve seemed utterly to forsake him. He knew the curse had fallen, and felt that he was no longer master of his own destinies.

In his trouble and despair he remembers his old counsellor; but Samuel was in his grave. With that mixture of superstition and religion which marked his whole career—the feeling which makes a godless man send for a priest on his death-bed—Saul determined to consult the witch of Endor. Towards midnight they met. Saul had disguised himself, and put on other raiment, and as he approached the woman he said, "I pray thee, divine unto me by the familiar spirit, and bring me up whom I shall name unto thee. . . . Then said the woman, Whom shall I bring up unto thee? And he said, Bring me up Samuel." She retires to an inner recess, and when the woman saw Samuel, she cried, with a loud voice, "Why hast thou deceived me? for thou art Saul. And the king said unto her, Be not afraid: for what sawest thou? And the woman said unto Saul, I saw gods ascending out of the earth. And he said unto her, What form is he of? And she said, An old man cometh up, and he is covered with a mantle. And Saul perceived that it was Samuel, and he stooped with his face to the ground, and bowed himself."

But what comfort has Samuel got for Saul? Comes there a voice from the depths of the grave to restore peace and confidence to the ruined king? "And Samuel said to Saul, Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up? And Saul answered, I am sore distressed, for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by prophets nor by dreams: therefore I have called thee, that thou mayest make known unto me what I shall do. Then said Samuel, Wherefore then dost thou ask of me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee, and is become thine enemy?" And once more from the godlike form of the "old man covered with a mantle" comes the prophetic woe! It is too much for the shaken mind of the king, and at the close of the denunciation he swoons away in despair and terror!

We, too, have had our counsellors in the past. The gulph of years may lie between us and them—the saintlike, the venerable, the loved ones! One by one they have gone on their way, and we have seen them no more. We may have treated their words lightly; we may have closed the door of memory on their forms; or we may have yielded ourselves to their guidance, and obeyed their warnings. God grant that when they rise up before us it may be with "angel faces," full of pity and love; with voices calling us to "come up higher," and not with averted looks and the reproachful utterance, "Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up?"

* * * * *

Forsaken alike by God and man, the unhappy king prepares to fight his last battle. Once the greatest captain of his age, he is now scarcely able to collect his scattered troops. His own demoralisation cannot long be concealed. His soldiers lose their confidence, a panic spreads through the ranks. "The men of Israel fled before the Philistines, and fell down slain in Mount Gilboa." But the martial spirit of Saul, though hopeless of victory, cannot brook defeat; he rushes into the thickest of the fray, and immediately falls, pierced with the arrows of the Philistines.

"So Saul died, and his three sons, and his armour-bearer, and all his men, that same day together."

Words can add nothing to such a life and death. History contains no more splendid rise and progress,—no more rapid decline,—no more strange and solemn catastrophe!

WHEAT-EARS.

Look at these green young ears of wheat—
How haughtily they stand,
With heads uplifted in the air,
Like lords of all the land.

And listen, while before the breeze
Their pride a moment yields,
Their little sighs of discontent
Are heard all down the fields.

But when their green has changed to gold,
And their chaff is filled with wheat,
Their heads will be as humbly bowed
As the hare-bells at their feet.

And so, dear, in my life's wheat-field,
How often do I see
That certain of the young ears stand
By far too haughtily.

But still in patient love I bear
Their pride day after day,
For well I know the time draws near
When it will pass away.

In God's good time, his gentle grace,
Like sun, and dew, and rain,
Will make his green wheat-ears all ripe,
And full of golden grain.—

Full of his Spirit's fruits of love,
And truth and righteousness;
And then each proud young head will bow
In perfect lowliness.

Yes, dear; it surely must be so,
In that blessed harvest-tide:
'Tis only in half empty souls,
There can be room for pride.

A GLIMPSE INTO AN EARNEST SOUL.

FROM SOME NEWLY-DISCOVERED LETTERS.

The hand was bold and free; but the spelling was uncertain, and the grammar was not always reliable. Occasionally the faultiness of expression was from the fulness of thought that could find no adequate outlet, and got confused and entangled on its way to expression. Occasionally it was from evident want of training. The writer was only a weaver of ribbons in a country town. His father had been a pious tradesman of the Reformed faith, but had died when the boy was six; and the widow had charge of the family, who were early apprenticed to various trades, yet not without much effort for their education. Young Gerhardt went to the High School, and learned the classics, and even Hebrew, as it was thought he might enter the Church; though the German seems to have been poorly taught, as is still the too common fate of the homely tongue in Latin schools. The university was barred to him by poverty; but his gift for languages was educated, and he became a fair proficient in the Bible tongues, in French, and Dutch—not without difficulty. His brother-in-law, to whom he was apprenticed at fifteen, had no sympathy with anything but business, denied him even an hour for meditation and study, and, when there fell to be no regular duty, set him irregularly to roll empty casks over the floor of an empty room: so that the apprentice was driven to sitting up stealthily in the cold nights, and snatch such learning as he could. Under this discipline he grew to be an industrious and patient worker, was loyal and obedient to his calling, and with his gay spirit, cheerfulness, and handsome face, was a favourite with his companions. Business never prospered with him, and after trying it for nearly ten years he gave it up, and learned linen-weaving, till it, in turn, threatened to break down his health, and drove him at last to ribbons. But before this happened a change had taken place in his inner life which enabled him to bear, and even pleasantly use, the changes and disappointments in his circumstances. He had lived decorously, and apparently religiously, without much inward strife and as little deep peace. He had found the Law to his hand, and thought he was keeping it as a Christian, holding off the sense of the breadth and awfulness of its requirements; till, by some trivial circumstance, it is not certain what, he was made to feel that the Law was no union between him and God; and God, he says, as his Friend, called him out of the world to follow Him in the Gospel. He had scarcely obtained this firm hold on truth when it was threatened to be taken from him. For five years he suffered from the most painful doubts, doubting even if there was a God at all. All truth became uncertain to him; his own salvation; the issue of this life in eternal good. He clung to what he had known and proved, though it brought him no peace and no gain. Without sunlight or even starlight, he wandered on, hoping that the end would come; and at the last the cloud did clear away, and he saw truth again clearly in Christ. The first letter must have been written about this time. He wrote it with his blood. The red is faded out almost now, and blackened with age; the purpose, the warmth, and solemnity of the writer are as legible as ever. It is addressed quaintly

"To my Jesus.

"I dedicate myself to Thee, Christ Jesus, my only Saviour and my Bridegroom, to be thine entire and everlasting possession. From this evening I reject with all my heart whatever right and power Satan, without right, gave me over myself, as one whom Thou, my Bridegroom by blood and my God, hast purchased through thy fight with death, through thy wrestling and bloody sweat in the garden of Gethsemane, to be thy possession and Bride; for whom Thou hast burst the gates of hell and revealed to me the loving heart of thy Father. From this evening, may my heart and all my love be offered up to Thee eternally in merited thanksgiving! From this day till eternity may thy will and not mine be done!

Command, rule, and govern me! I give Thee full power over me, and promise, with thy help and grace, that this my blood shall flow out to the last drop, sooner than, with will and knowledge, inwardly or outwardly, I be unfaithful or disobedient to Thee. Lo, Thou hast me altogether, O sweet Friend of Souls! in modest virgin love I cling to Thee. Take not away thy Spirit from me. May thy Spirit not turn from me: may thy death-fight strengthen me! Yea, Amen. May thy Spirit seal what in simplicity hath written "Thine unworthy possession,

"GERH. TERSTEEGEN.

"On Green Thursday Evening, 1724."

The dedication of himself was real. He lived henceforth with entire simplicity for Christ. He lived poor; he had often scarcely bread, nor had he at first friends who knew his need. He worked from five in the morning till nine at night at an ungrateful trade. But he knew there must be poorer than himself; and after work he would start out on errands of charity. He spent whatever he had, living quietly for many years in a modest lodging, and cooking his own meals; and when even ribbon-making deserted him, he continued dependent on such supplies as God sent for his daily need. He was repeatedly offered large sums, which he as steadily refused. They would have furnished him with an ample yearly income, but he dreaded the effect upon his faith and independence. So long as the little sum that fell to his inheritance lasted, and so long as he could work at his trade, he would take nothing; and when these sources of income were exhausted, some friends, to whom it was a pleasure, sent him what was necessary for bare want. He was a good son and brother: when his brothers died, it was to him that their children came. He taught his nephews and nieces, sheltered them in his house, and never lost sight of them. They may have thought him odd. Piety was not a recommendation at the time; and he was known as a pietist—severe in his morals, absolute and honest in his unworldliness. But there was no pretence about him: no shallow religious life, but the life of an earnest soul absorbed by the one view of Christ and his love. Impressions were left on his kindred of an unmistakably Christian character—impressions which outlived the feelings of dislike to what seemed narrow-mindedness. Correspondence passed between him and the young people, to one of whom the next letter must have been written.

"From your pleasant letter of November 2nd, I am glad to learn of your welfare and health, which is a special benefit and grace of God; for since you left home many a man, and even many a young man, has been called into Eternity, as might easily have happened to you. Now, who knows but that this great transition to Eternity is near, at our very door? Yet we know, also, out of God's Word, which cannot lie, that without regeneration and sanctification we cannot see the kingdom of God. I hope, therefore, that you will take this to heart, and not slight precious grace and the time thereof. I am glad that you know your sins a little, and that you will lend a willing ear to the call of grace. But, for all that, you are not yet a converted man, although such feeling and your desire is indeed a grace of God, and a source from which something better may spring if you give place to this convincing grace. Of ourselves we have not a single good thought; and if we have but one good thought in sorrow for our state, or longing for God, we need not imagine that it came to us by chance; but we should think, The merciful God and Saviour cometh to thy heart and calleth thee, that He may save thee as a brand from the burning of everlasting destruction. And by the love we have for our immortal soul we should not let such precious emotions be stifled through vanity and careless behaviour; nor should we listen to Satan when he would make us wise, saying that one is still young, that one cannot live so strictly, that one would be foolish to think of it, that many a one has thought to be saved without being so very precise, that God is gracious and merciful, and other such cunning suggestions, whereby men are secretly deceived until their time of grace is past, and on their death-bed their eyes are opened and they are filled with fear and dread. Well; we shall not act thus, but to-day, because we hear the voice of God, we shall abide still and say:

> 'The night is past: the time to slumber o'er;
> This day salvation cometh to thy door.'

And, with the Prodigal Son, 'I will arise and will go to my Father, and will say unto Him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight.' Read once more, and with prayer, the story of the Prodigal Son, in the fifteenth chapter of Luke, and you will see how a penitent sinner must come to God, and how ready the eternal, loving, Fatherheart of God is to receive the poor, returning, penitent sinner.

"What you write is quite true, that when we fear we are overburthened with many sins, we cannot draw near to God with free confidence. But what are we to do? We cannot make good our past transgressions: we cannot make ourselves pious; we need not fancy we would come if we were only once pious. That, indeed, by no means: but we must come just as we are, with all our sins and corruption, and must cry to God for the pardon of our many sins, for the sake of that dear Saviour Jesus, who for our sins poured out his precious blood, and endured all the pains of hell, that He might obtain pardon and grace for penitent sinners. You must not leave off this continuous prayer for God's grace, for the sake of Jesus Christ; and the more your sins press upon you, so much the more humbly and heartily call upon the blessed Saviour, and hold before Him his bitter pains. God will then, at his own time, certainly have mercy, and send you forgiveness of sins, free confidence, and a new heart, so that it will be your pleasure to serve Him, to love Him, and to deny everything for his sake. O, how blessed the man is who chooses this way, and does not leave it till he has found this great good! Nothing can give me more joy than to see and hear this of you, and I shall not fail to pray God for it through his grace. Pray, also, yourself diligently, and avoid all hurtful society. The blessed God hath given grace to your brother Gerret, from whom I had a letter last Sunday, and I hope that every day he will be strengthened and advanced. Your brothers Henry and William also feel that things must be changed. May God help you all to break through, so that God and his children may through you rejoice, and, after short time of this woful life, we may find each other eternally before God's face. Wishing this, I greet you heartily, my beloved nephew, and, commending you to God, I remain,

"Your affectionate uncle, at your service,

"GERH. TERSTEEGEN.

"Mühlheim on the Ruhr, 9 Nov., 1745."

This letter presents one aspect of the good man's faith. He was ceaselessly earnest in pressing men to Christ. His theology was simple and full of broad contrasts: on the one side the devil beguiling men by selfishness to ruin, on the other Christ drawing them to heaven: on the one side a nature utterly corrupt, on the other a nature infinitely pure. But everywhere he discerned God's Spirit in the good. Be the good what it might, ever so transitory, the flashing of a single thought, the one purpose crossing an evil life, he held it to have come from Him. There could be no doubt, no accident in it; there was no source for it in the human heart; it was the proof of a continued seeking out of men by God, of his nearness to them, of the suggestions that his love was always throwing out in the world. The love and presence of God were very dear to him. He set them over against sin, guilt, and hell. He turned to them for their own sakes. Union with Christ was the thought that ruled his life, his dream and passion. "If I only think God is," he would say, "my whole soul is bowed in the deepest reverence and prayer." "He of Himself can make any place and any thing pleasant," he said again; "without Him it can have no pleasure." "Let thyself sink," he would say, "gently and like a child in the bosom of eternal Love." I have often heard my grandfather talk of him, and I remember how these and other sayings, which would draw the tears to my grandfather's eyes, vaguely and deeply impressed me. He liked to be alone, that he might share the fullest fellowship with God. When his friend Sommer lived with him, he insisted that they should each withdraw from their work-room for an hour in the day. Christ was everything to him; and in quiet hours and by quiet ways he sought Him: not so much in active life as out of it. Here and there he found some that thought with him. It was probably to one of them that he wrote what follows:—

"TO MY DEARLY BELOVED SISTER IN JESUS.

"THE peace of God anoint thy spirit! I received your first delightful letter of the 25th of June, by post, in good time, and read it with the truest pleasure. The second also reached me safely through friend B.; but was delayed. Praised and beloved be our dear Immanuel for the acquaintance and fellowship He has given us in Him. I know that He has given it, and that He has established it for a blessing, and will perfect it in us unto his eternal glory. If I did not know that our fellowship in the Lord was such as it is, I could not have been so easy during my long silence. I make no apology for this silence, and indeed I did not remain silent, but as often as the Lord allowed me to approach Him, I remembered you, sister S., and by one look in spirit and truth, have said and wished more than I could have done by pen and through the grosser senses. The Lord truly is in our midst, but his very nearness draws our whole memory, love, and all the powers of our soul up to Him. The least look aside is to be condemned; it hurts our simplicity, it disturbs our peace. Love demands for its object what is noble, direct, and entire; we feel also that we are not contented with anything less. You, I know, will agree with me. This highest good will be all and only what we strive for, the very central point on which our whole being turns, wherein is true felicity,—it will still abide when all mediums shall have passed away, and Love itself shall receive us. Would that it were so this day! Yet self-will obtains nothing for us, or if it has obtained anything, it mars it. Selfish impulse and hard forceful will stand most visibly in the way of inner fellowship with God. The soul would gladly have this or that, would gladly be found somehow or other before God: but it wishes for it by its own eagerness: and the soul will not reach its desires until its own will and seeking have died out and it is tranquil. We often think such a thing is far off, and we only make it further by our eager and mere desire to have it; so that I many a time say, We must not seek God but only find Him. Oh, if we were only child-like enough! The soul often longs profoundly for annihilation, to find itself complete in God, as we do: but our natural wisdom pursues such an object sometimes by ways that are inconsistent with the soul's, so that it cannot find its end, God's free mercy alone can help us; and that there is nothing better than, without self-will, to abide sunk in the bosom of Love, like children who are passive to a sign from their father, and trust everything to his goodness. It is not our work, but the Lord's: Jesus has opened the gates for us by his blood; He will save his people from their sins: we must not think to do it. It is well, therefore, that we should not too much regard sin, misery, weakness, &c., but give ourselves over to Jesus and choose Him alone and in every way: for He is all, and He should be always growing more all to us. Amen! Jesus! Thou art near. Thou knowest what our inmost soul saith to Thee, for Thou hast put it into our soul to say it. We are offered up to Thee for ever. Complete the sacrifice after thy good pleasure, through Thyself! Amen!"

This was the last letter I took up out of the pile of yellow, old-fashioned papers. The rest were not in the same hand; but were accounts, invoices, family-correspondence, and odds and ends of the waste-basket, swept together by accident of some careless hand. Yet other letters may lie elsewhere in this empty house, worth careful search if they yield anything like the dry withered heap at my feet. He said once that if the name of Jesus were only impressed on men, he had rather the name of Gerhardt Tersteegen might perish. It would almost seem as if his wish were true.

JOHN KEYSER.

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.*

The strangers for whom Edinburgh puts on her fresh summer dress, whom she greets with the pale green of beech and poplar, and the glory of lilac and laburnum, are not tourists from distant lands, but country ministers and elders whose homes lie scattered from the Tweed and the Solway to the Hebrides and the Shetlands. Long before Exeter Hall was even in embryo, or May Meetings began to muster in London, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland met in Edinburgh, usually occupying for the ten or twelve days of its sitting the last days of May and the first days of June. Unhappily, in place of the one Assembly which in earlier times represented the Church and nation of Scotland, there are now (besides smaller gatherings) three great meetings, representing, in addition to the Established Church, the earlier and later separations that have taken place from its pale. The former of these—the United Presbyterian Church—held its meetings this year a few days earlier than the other two. The Free Church, which makes a point of adhering as closely as possible to old rules and forms, runs alongside of the Established during the whole period of its sittings. The United Presbyterian Synod embraces all the ministers of the body, with one lay-elder for every minister. The Assemblies of the Established and Free Churches are more strictly representative; so that while a few members, clerical and lay, are returned year after year, the greater proportion of the clergy have seats only at an interval of three or four years, and can seldom obtain that familiarity with the business, or that home-feeling, which belong to those that are constantly in the field.

The public interest attached to these meetings was this year unusually great. Much anxiety was shown as to the course which the two Nonconformist bodies would take on the union now under consideration, and an equal interest was felt in the manner in which the Assembly of the Established Church would deal with certain changes, actual or supposed to be contemplated, on the part of some members of that Church. In regard to the latter subject, the policy of the Assembly has been conservative. The use of a Prayer-book in the Old Greyfriars' Church, Edinburgh, has been disallowed; the details of worship in the several congregations have been more emphatically placed under the charge of Presbyteries; and any tendency to laxity in regard to the doctrinal standards of the Church has been discouraged. A somewhat remarkable position has been taken up, in the appointment of a committee to consider the propriety of taking steps for obtaining the removal of lay-patronage, and the recognition of the voice of the people in the election of their ministers. Those who are moving in this direction feel that, as lay-patronage has been the occasion of all the separations that have rent and weakened the Church, so the removal of this grievance might pave the way for the return of some of those who have left it, and bring about a reconstruction of Scottish Presbyterianism. There were some emphatic protests, by Lord Selkirk and others, against even the appointment of a committee for this purpose, and earnest asseverations that the movement could not succeed.

The question of union between the United Presbyterian and Free Churches is yet only in its preliminary stages. Three years have been spent by committees in private negotiations, with the view of ascertaining whether it is possible to construct a scheme of union. This preliminary inquiry is not yet quite concluded; but it is so far advanced that it was proposed on both sides to send down the interim report of the several Union Committees to Presbyteries, in order that they might offer suggestions, if they should see cause, as to the propriety of making further inquiries. This proposal was all but unanimously agreed to, both in the United Presbyterian Synod and in the Free Church Assembly. The great question of union has not yet been brought to a direct issue, and anything in the shape of discussion amounted to little more than indications of feeling, which the progress of the question may either remove, modify, or confirm. In the Free Church Assembly no quarter was shown to those who, while friendly to the union now proposed, ventured to hope that a day might come when the three great Presbyterian bodies should again become one.

It is pleasant to see the prominence given by the various bodies to missionary undertakings at home and abroad. The United Presbyterian Synod reported an income for home and foreign missionary purposes of £34,524, being £5285 more than the previous year. The Established Church and the Free Church had also to report a very considerable increase of revenue. The Established Church continues to make great and successful efforts on behalf of its endowment scheme, for providing endowments by voluntary contributions for additional charges. Both the Established and the United Presbyterian Churches have been devoting much attention to the building-up and improving of their Sabbath-schools, and with considerable success. In the Free Church one of the most interesting features is the success and prosperity of some of the territorial charges, organised on the model of Dr. Chalmers.

In the Free Church Assembly there was a notable debate on the employment of hymns in public worship. From time immemorial in certain districts of the country, especially the Highlands, nothing has been sung in public worship but a metrical version of the Psalms; and nowhere has there been a very liberal use of other material, for the sixty-seven "Paraphrases," as they are called, i.e., hymns founded on passages of Scripture, which are bound up with the metrical Psalms, are but sparingly employed. From the force of long-continued habit, many would seem to have had a difficulty in persuading themselves that it could be lawful to sing in public worship anything but the Psalms; and others expressed the fear that the sanction of human compositions would imply a slight on the inspired songs of Scripture. The progress of the discussion showed the untenableness of such positions, and made it plain enough that there was no good reason for depriving the Church of an aid to faith and devotion on which a marvellous blessing had so often rested. The course resolved on by the majority was the appointment of a committee to consider the whole subject, and to report to next Assembly.

The only case of discipline that had much general interest occurred in the Free Church Assembly, a member of the church in Glasgow having appealed against a sentence that suspended him from church privileges, in consequence of his being employed from one o'clock on Sundays in the printing-office of a daily newspaper. The delicacy of the case was freely admitted, as well as the difficulty of framing rules to determine what can be said to constitute a sufficient justification of Sunday labour. But it was the opinion of the Assembly that in this case there was no such justification; and while the sentence of the inferior court was confirmed, it was remitted to the Kirk-session to deal tenderly with the appellant, in the hope that he would come to see that the course he was following was not justifiable.

Another proof of the practical difficulty of dealing with the Sunday question has been furnished by the course of Lord Chelmsford's bill in the House of Lords, to regulate Sunday trading in the metropolis. The principle, or at least the practical effect, of the measure was, to afford only partial protection for the day for rest. It was accordingly opposed by those who think that the protection of a part sanctions the secularisation of the rest of the day; and even among those who were in favour of protecting a part, there was much difference as to the details which ought to be introduced. The Lord's Day Observance Society had petitioned against the bill; and it was defeated on the third reading by a majority of 69 to 39.

Some of the English bishops seem to be anxious to bring the use of symbolical vestments and other novelties to the test of law, and an elaborate memorial has lately been submitted to eminent counsel—Sir Roundell Palmer and Sir Hugh Cairns, and others—concluding with the following questions:—

I. Suppose a clergyman of the Established Church of England to administer the Holy Communion in a parish church, habited in the vestments prescribed by King Edward the Sixth's first prayer-book (1549) does he infringe the law, and commit an offence cognisable by any legal tribunal?

II. Suppose him to introduce into the Communion Service the use of two or more lights on the communion-table, not burnt for the sake of giving light, but as an ingredient in the service itself; or the use of incense burnt in thuribles or censers for censing persons or things; or the ceremonial mixing of water with the sacramental wine; or the use of wafers instead of bread, such as is usual to be eaten; or the use of hymns before or after the prayer of consecration, or at the time of administering the elements; does he thereby infringe the law and commit an offence cognisable by any legal tribunal?

III. What would be the best way in which to raise these questions so as to obtain a decision upon them?

To these questions the reply has been given, that the first two are to be answered in the affirmative, and that a proceeding under the Church Discipline Act of 1840 is the only way to raise these questions so as to get a decision upon them. The questions refer to but a portion of the practices that have been lately introduced.

A statement is reported to have been lately made by Archbishop Manning, that a thousand of the English clergy were doing the work of the Church of Rome. If Father Ignatius, of Norwich, be one of them, it does not appear that he has had much to encourage him in his efforts to revive monasticism. His father, Mr. Lyne, wrote some weeks ago to a newspaper that his son had returned home, and was reconsidering his course; and while reprobating the cruel scandals that had been circulated against him as unfounded, maintained that his devotion and earnestness, though erratic, were most sincere. Ignatius himself confessed, "I have been deceived by many of the clergy; all support has left me; I am in debt and a beggar, without hope; my health and strength have failed; the slanderer seeks to destroy me; and I fly and am safe in my father's house."

In an earnest appeal issued by the Bishop of London for further contributions to his fund for increasing the means of grace in London, it is stated that since its commencement it has provided stipends for about 110 additional clergy, and 68 additional lay agents, and has expended about £86,000 on buildings and sites for churches, mission chapels, and schools. He reckons that 220,000 persons have thus been brought under spiritual supervision. The entire sum as yet paid and promised, applicable to all purposes, is £254,000. In many cases, the stipends have been provided only for a limited time, and it depends on the energy with which the scheme is worked out, and the particular missions and new charges are fostered, whether or not the benefit will be permanent. On such grounds, the bishop makes a strong appeal for increased support.

Revelations of the miserable condition of our public institutions for the poor are coming before the public with appalling frequency. The casual ward of Lambeth has gained an historical repute. It appears that the ordinary wards in some poor-houses deserve a like notoriety. Recently, charges were brought against the Strand workhouse of a deplorable kind. The sick, it was represented, were almost wholly neglected; they were robbed by the attendants employed to care for them; their food and their medicines were not properly administered; the overcrowding was grievous, especially in the case of children; and little or no effort was made to separate the sick from the healthy. An official investigation into these charges shows that they are not without foundation. It is at least well that daylight is in the course of being let in on these institutions; but it will tax the Christian ingenuity of the country to the utmost to provide a sufficient and satisfactory remedy.

Among the new societies that have sprung from the movements of the day is one that bears the rather high-sounding title of the Victoria Institute, or Philosophical Society of Great Britain. It is designed to prosecute scientific investigation in the spirit of reverence for Divine revelation, and in the belief that there can be no real contradiction between the facts of science, and the statements of the Bible. At its first anniversary, an elaborate address was delivered by the Rev. Walter Mitchell, of Queen's College, Cambridge, and formerly lecturer on natural philosophy at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, in which he expressed a most earnest desire that scientific inquiry would be prosecuted to the utmost, but not under the influence of a principle of rationalism, which had been defined by one of its advocates as the fact that "the gradual reduction of all phenomena within the sphere of established law carries with it, as a consequence, the rejection of the miraculous." He was persuaded that "the more we know, the more deeply we investigate the phenomena of nature, the more are we compelled to admit our own ignorance. Laws of nature we confess, with Hooker, have in them 'more than men have as yet attained to know, or perhaps ever shall attain, seeing the travail of wading herein is given of God to the sons of men, that perceiving how much the least thing in the world hath in it more than the wisest are able to reach unto, they might by this means learn with humility.' Humbly we confess, with Bishop Butler, 'other orders of creatures may perhaps be let into the secret counsels of Heaven, and have the designs and methods of Providence in the creation and government of the world communicated to them, but this does not belong to our rank and condition.' Of one thing I feel the deepest conviction, that nothing man has yet discovered, no length to which science has been pursued, has at all educed any principle diametrically opposed to the truths of religion; any principle like law destroying the idea of creation and design, which should lead us to regard Moses in no other light than a Hebrew Descartes or a Newton."—It is now nearly two years since the indefatigable M. Guizot published the first volume of a work which was to be followed by three other volumes. The work was entitled "Meditations on Christianity," and the first volume was devoted to the essence or subject-matter of the Christian revelation. The second was to be on the history and origin of Christianity; the third, on its revival in the nineteenth century; and the fourth, on its future history. The pressure of events has constrained the author to modify his original plan, and publish as his second volume, "Meditations on the Actual Condition of the Christian Religion." He gives a picture of the revival of religious feeling in France since the commencement of the present century; estimates the various systems of philosophy, pantheism, materialism, &c., which are the rivals of Christianity at the present day; and paints the strange mingling of doubt, incredulity, and carelessness which the religious conflicts of the age have caused. He manifests a deep interest in the various efforts that have been made to liberalise catholicism; while admitting that as yet they have failed. He cannot tell how or when Christian faith and freedom of thought will find their reconciliation, but he is persuaded that the solution of the question will come. M. Guizot's account of the revival of religious feeling in the Protestant community of France is very interesting. He dwells with peculiar fondness and admiration on Adolphe Monod and Alexander Vinet, evidently feeling a degree of sympathy with them which no other Protestant divines have awakened.

The war with Dr. Colenso has assumed a new phase. With an appetite for heresy and strife that grows by what it feeds on, he has raised a fresh issue betwixt himself and the friends of revelation. In a letter published in the Pall Mall Gazette, he says,—

"A violent attack (as you will see in the Witness) has just been made upon me with reference to my new Hymn-book, which (strange to say) I find does not contain the name "Jesus" or "Christ" from one end to the other. This was quite unintentional on my part, and has merely arisen from the fact of my having rejected hymn after hymn which contained prayers to Christ, which I do object to on Scriptural and Apostolical grounds, as I hope to set forth in a sermon, and others in which the name of Jesus is used familiarly and irreverently, and others in which some objectionable doctrine is taught in the hymn throughout, or in some verse of it."

In commenting on this letter the Spectator admits that Dr. Colenso has taken a step which brings to an end any claim he may be supposed to have had to hold his views within the Church. The whole English liturgy is founded on the principle he impugns, that prayer may and should be offered to Christ. The statement that he objects to such prayer "on Scriptural and Apostolical grounds," if it does not imply Arianism or Unitarianism, expresses a conviction that cannot but be derogatory to the glory of Christ's divine person. The Natal Witness gives some samples of the manner in which Dr. Colenso has manipulated certain hymns in which the name of Jesus or Christ occurred. Such verses as the following, which occurred in the old collection, are omitted in the new :—

"Whatever be our destined case,
Accept us in Thy Son;
Give us Thy Gospel and Thy Grace,
And then—Thy Will be done."

"Father! we Thy mercy praise
Which gave Thy Son to die;
Brightness of Thy Father's face!
Thee, too, we glorify;

Holy Comforter Divine!
Praise to Thee by all be given,
Till we in full chorus join,
And earth resounds to heaven."

"My soul, bear thou thy part,
Triumph in God above,
And with a well-tuned heart
Sing thou the songs of love!
Thou art His own Whose precious Blood,
Shed for thy Good, His love made known."

In other instances, the name of Christ is changed into that of God.

"But 'tis enough that Christ knows all," becomes,—

"But 'tis enough that God knows all."

"Then He his love in Christ proclaimed," is changed into,—

"Then He his love and truth proclaimed."

So also,—

"Who see your Saviour's face," is corrected,—

"Who see your Maker's face."

Dr. Colenso's positions were already sufficiently alarming to show the perilous path on which he had entered; that he should so speedily and so gratuitously have made this attack on the very citadel of Christian faith and hope appears a proof of judicial blindness, of a determination to drive off from him even the very small remnant that hitherto have refused to cast him off.

An important step towards the development of a higher missionary spirit, and the training of a missionary staff, has been taken in Edinburgh under the auspices of Dr. Duff. A sum of ten thousand pounds has been contributed for the endowment of a chair of missions in connection with the New College, Edinburgh. It is in contemplation, on the part of Dr. Duff, that the Professor who is to fill this chair shall be the head of a great missionary institute, where the training of workers for foreign fields may be carried on in all its departments.

A letter has been received by a member of the Church Missionary Society, from an American missionary, Mr. C. R. S. Brown, giving some interesting statements respecting Christianity and missionary enterprise in Japan. It appears that for five or six years there have been Protestant missionaries in Japan, representing three or four branches of the Church of Christ. At first the Government regarded them with the utmost suspicion, but the feeling is different now. Some of the missionaries teach schools, and employ and explain school-books that contain statements of Christian truth. At Yeddo, the Council of State is erecting buildings for a school intended to give a high education, including a French and English department, and the Protestant missionaries have been requested to take charge of the latter. A Japanese-English Dictionary, containing some 40,000 words, is now nearly ready for the press. Most of the missionaries have been to work at a translation of the Bible, and in a few months it is hoped that the four Gospels will be published in Japanese. On the part of young men of the upper class, a considerable anxiety is manifested to become acquainted with Western science and literature, and some of them come to the missionaries to read the English Bible, and express the earnest desire that the day may soon come when all their countrymen shall have the Holy Scriptures, and the free political institutions of which they are the basis.

The population of Japan is estimated at 32,000,000. The proceedings of the Jesuits and monks of former times were such that most stringent measures were used to efface the very name of Christianity, and as the Bible was not left behind when the Jesuits were banished, no living seed of Christianity remained to propagate itself. By the existing law, every man, woman, and child must be registered at some Buddhist or Shinto temple, or be denied decent burial. The edicts consigning the Japanese to death if they should embrace Christianity, are as yet unrepealed. The situation of the missionaries, and still more of any converts they might bring to Christ, is thus both delicate and solemn. The ordeal to be passed through might be one of fire and death, should any poor Japanese have courage to confess the name of Christ. The call for prayer is very loud, that the Spirit of God may move the rulers of Japan to grant freedom of conscience to their subjects, and that the treaty-powers represented in Japan may be induced to do all that Christian governments ought to do to secure to the natives this great right and privilege.

Evidences of the manifold progress that India is now making are furnished very rapidly from various sources. A brief statement in the Church Missionary Intelligencer brings together a variety of interesting facts. As a proof of social progress, reference is made to a recent Exhibition at Nagpore, where, breaking forth from the exclusiveness of former generations, thousands of spectators of all ranks met freely with Europeans and with one another. The educational progress is evinced by the marvellous success of the Calcutta University. Mr. Maine, the Vice-Chancellor, at a recent Convocation, declared that since the middle ages such enthusiasm for university studies and honours had not been shown by any European university. Mr. Maine's Bill, "to legalise under certain circumstances the dissolution of the marriages of native converts to Christianity," is another remarkable evidence of progress. The views of the Christian convert on the subject of marriage are now to be given effect to ;—and though in itself this is but a simple act of justice, yet it is indicative of a great change, that the Christian convert, as such, should obtain any legal recognition at all. An important movement among natives against polygamy, too, has been resuscitated. Some years ago, a petition from 25,000 Hindus of Bengal was presented to the Lieutenant-Governor and the Legislative Council "bringing to the notice of the Council the grievous and revolting abuses of the practice of polygamy in Bengal, and praying for a legislative enactment for the prevention thereof." The Indian mutiny broke out almost immediately after, and the matter dropped out of view. But now, 21,000 Bengalees of all classes, chiefly orthodox and educated, have renewed the petition. The petition proceeds on the duty of the British Government to suppress social abuses which are not founded on reason, nor on the national religion, and especially when the people themselves are most forward in asking legislative interference; and it prays the Governor "to emancipate the females of Bengal from the pains, cruelties, and attendant crimes of the debasing custom of polygamy." Mr. Beadon, in his reply, promises to submit the petition to the Governor-General in Council, and with his concurrence, to introduce a Bill next session for securing the object in view. The Friend of India says that among the 21,000 signatures, each of which is "intelligent and bonâ fide, are the highest in rank, learning, wealth, and sanctity in Bengal; and opposed to the movement is only one family, which represents none but itself." Even the cloudy retreats of the Sanskrit "toles" in Nuddea have failed to send forth a sound against the most monstrous perversion of Hindu law, which annually exposes hundreds of widows and wives to prostitution in Bengal.

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

XXIX.

But of the two, Catherine had herself to go first. Again and again was I sent for to say farewell to Mrs. Tomkins, and again and again I returned home leaving her asleep, and for the time better. But on a Saturday evening, as I sat by my vestry-fire, pondering on many things, and trying to make myself feel that they were as God saw them and not as they appeared to me, young Tom came to me with the news that his sister seemed much worse, and his father would be much obliged if I would go and see her. I sent Tom on before, because I wished to follow alone.

It was a brilliant starry night; no moon, no clouds, no wind, nothing but stars. They seemed to lean down towards the earth, as I have seen them since in more southern regions. It was, indeed, a glorious night. That is, I knew it was; I did not feel that it was. For the death which I went to be near, came, with a strange sense of separation, between me and the nature around me. I felt as if nature knew nothing, felt nothing, meant nothing, did not belong to humanity at all; for here was death, and there shone the stars. I was wrong, as I knew afterwards.

I had had very little knowledge of the external shows of death. Strange as it may appear, I had never yet seen a fellow-creature pass beyond the call of his fellow-mortals. I had not even seen my father die. And the thought was oppressive to me. "To think," I said to myself, as I walked over the bridge to the village-street—"to think that the one moment the person is here, and the next—who shall say where? for we know nothing of the region beyond the grave! Not even our risen Lord thought fit to bring back from Hades any news for the human family standing straining their eyes after their brothers and sisters that have vanished in the dark. Surely it is well, all well, although we know nothing, save that our Lord has been there, knows all about it, and does not choose to tell us. Welcome ignorance, then! the ignorance in which He chooses to leave us. I would rather not know, if He gave me my choice, but preferred that I should not know." And so the oppression passed from me, and I was free.

But little as I knew of the signs of the approach of death, I was certain, the moment I saw Catherine, that the veil that hid the "silent land" had begun to lift slowly between her and it. And for a moment I almost envied her that she was so soon to see and know that after which our blindness and ignorance were wondering and hungering. She could hardly speak. She looked more patient than calm. There was no light in the room but that of the fire, which flickered flashing and fading, now lighting up the troubled eye, and now letting a shadow of the coming repose fall gently over it. Thomas sat by the fire with the child on his knee, both looking fixedly into the glow. Gerard's natural mood was so quiet and earnest, that the solemnity about him did not oppress him. He looked as if he were present at some religious observance of which he felt more than he understood, and his childish peace was in no wise inharmonious with the awful silence of the coming change. He was no more disquieted at the presence of death than the stars were.

And this was the end of the lovely girl—to leave the fair world still young, because a selfish man had seen that she was fair. No time can change the relation of cause and effect. The poison that operates ever so slowly is yet poison, and yet slays. And that man was now murdering her, with weapon long-reaching from out of the past. But no, thank God! this was not the end of her. Though there is woe for that man by whom the offence cometh, yet there is provision for the offence. There is One who bringeth light out of darkness, joy out of sorrow, humility out of wrong. Back to the Father's house we go with the sorrows and sins which, instead of inheriting the earth, we gathered and heaped upon our weary shoulders, and a different Elder Brother from that angry one who would not receive the poor swine-humbled prodigal, takes the burden from our shoulders, and leads us into the presence of the Good.

She put out her hand feebly, let it lie in mine, looked as if she wanted me to sit down by her bedside, and when I did so, closed her eyes. She said nothing. Her father was too much troubled to meet me without showing the signs of his distress, and his was a nature that ever sought concealment for its emotion, therefore he sat still. But Gerard crept down from his knee, came to me, clambered up on mine, and laid his little hand upon his mother's, which I was holding. She opened her eyes, looked at the child, shut them again, and tears came out from between the closed lids.

"Has Gerard ever been baptised?" I asked her.

Her lips indicated a no.

"Then I will be his godfather. And that will be a pledge to you that I will never lose sight of him."

She pressed my hand, and the tears came faster.

Believing with all my heart that the dying should remember their dying Lord, and that the "Do this in remembrance of me," can never be better obeyed than when the partaker is about to pass, supported by the God of his faith, through the same darkness which lay before our Lord when He uttered the words and appointed the symbol, we sat, Thomas and I, and young Tom, who had by this time joined us with his sister Mary, around the bed, and partook with the dying woman of the signs of that death, wherein our Lord gave Himself entirely to us, to live by his death, and to the Father of us all in holiest sacrifice as the high-priest of us his people, leading us to the altar of a like self-abnegation. Upon what that bread and that wine mean, the sacrifice of our Lord, the whole world of humanity hangs. It is the redemption of men.

After the holy symbol had been thus performed, she lay still as before. I heard her murmur once, "Lord, I do not deserve it. But I do love thee." And about two hours after she quietly breathed her last. We all kneeled, and I thanked the Father of us aloud that He had taken her to Himself. Gerard had been fast asleep on his aunt's lap, and she had put him to bed a little before. Surely he slept a deeper sleep than his mother's; for had she not awaked even as she fell asleep?

When I came out once more, I knew better what the stars meant. They looked to me now as if they knew all about death, and therefore could not be sad to the eyes of men; as if that unsympathetic look they wore came from this, that they were made like the happy truth, and not like our fears.

But soon the solemn feeling of repose, the sense that the world and all its cares would thus pass into nothing, vanished in its turn. For a moment I had been, as it were, walking on the shore of the Eternal, where the tide of time had left me in its retreat. Far away across the level sands I heard it moaning, but I stood on the firm ground of truth, and heeded it not. In a few moments more it was raving around me; it had carried me away from my rest, and I was filled with the noise of its cares.

For when I returned home, my sister told me that Old Rogers had called, and seemed concerned not to find me at home. He would have gone to find me, my sister said, had I been anywhere but by a death-bed. He would not leave any message, however, saying he would call in the morning.

I thought it better to go to his house. The stars were still shining as brightly as before, but a strong foreboding of trouble filled my mind, and once more the stars were far away, and lifted me no nearer to "Him who made the seven stars and Orion." When I examined myself, I could give no reason for my sudden fearfulness, save this: that as I went to Catherine's house, I had passed Jane Rogers on her way to her father's; and having just greeted her, had gone on; but, as it now came back upon me, she had looked at me strangely—that is, with some significance in her face which conveyed nothing to me; and now her father had been to seek me: it must have something to do with Miss Oldcastle.

But when I came to the cottage, it was dark and still, and I could not bring myself to rouse the weary man from his bed. Indeed it was past eleven, as I found to my surprise on looking at my watch. So I turned and lingered by the old mill, and fell a pondering on the profusion of strength that rushed past the wheel away to the great sea, doing nothing. "Nature," I thought, "does not demand that power should always be force. Power itself must repose. He that believeth shall not make haste, says the Bible. But it needs strength to be still. Is my faith not strong enough to be still?" I looked up to the heavens once more, and the quietness of the stars seemed to reproach me. "We are safe up here," they seemed to say: "we shine, fearless and confident, for the God who gave the primrose its rough leaves to hide in from the blast of uneven spring, hangs us in the awful hollows of space. We cannot fall out of his safety. Lift up your eyes on high, and behold! Who hath created these things—that bringeth out their host by number? He calleth them all by names. By the greatness of his might, for that He is strong in power, not one faileth. Why sayest thou, O Jacob! and speakest, O Israel! my way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God?"

The night was very still; there was, I thought, no one awake within miles of me. The stars seemed to shine into me the divine reproach of those glorious words. "O my God!" I cried, and fell on my knees by the mill-door.

What I tried to say more I will not say here. I may say that I cried to God. What I said to Him ought not, cannot be repeated to another.

When I opened my eyes I saw the door of the mill was open too, and there in the door, his white head glimmering, stood Old Rogers, with a look on his face as if he had just come down from the mount. I started to my feet, with that strange feeling of something like shame that seizes one at the very thought of other eyes than those of the Father. The old man came forward, and bowed his head with an unconscious expression of humble dignity, but would have passed me without speech, leaving the mill-door open behind him. I could not bear to part with him thus.

"Won't you speak to me, Rogers?" I said.

He turned at once.

"I beg your pardon, sir. I was ashamed of having intruded on you, and I thought you would rather be left alone. I thought—I thought——" hesitated the old man, "that you might like to go into the mill, for the night's cold out o' doors."

"Thank you, Rogers. I won't now. I thought you had been in bed. How do you come to be out so late?"

"You see, sir, when I'm in any trouble, it's no use to go to bed. I can't sleep. I only keep the old 'oman wakin'. And the key o' the mill allus hangin' at the back o' my door, and knowin' it to be a good place to—to—shut the door in, I came out as soon as she was asleep; but I little thought to see you, sir."

"I came to find you, not thinking how the time went. Catherine Weir is gone home."

"I am right glad to hear it, poor woman. And perhaps something will come out now that will help us."

"I do not quite understand you," I said, with hesitation.

But Rogers made no reply.

"I am sorry to hear you are in trouble to-night. Can I help you?" I resumed.

"If you can help yourself, sir, you can help me. But I have no right to say so. Only, if a pair of old eyes be not blind, a man may pray to God about anything he sees. I was prayin' hard about you in there, sir, while you was on your knees o' the other side o' the door."

I could partly guess what the old man meant, and I could not ask him for further explanation.

"What did you want to see me about?" I inquired.

He hesitated for a moment.

"I daresay it was very foolish of me, sir. But I just wanted to tell you that—our Jane was down here from the Hall this arternoon——"

"I passed her on the bridge. Is she quite well?"

"Yes, yes, sir. You know that's not the point."

The old man's tone seemed to reprove me for vain words, and I held my peace.

"The Captain's there again."

An icy spear seemed to pass through my heart. I could make no reply. The same moment a cold wind blew on me from the open door of the mill.

Although Lear was of course right when he said,

> "The tempest in my mind
> Doth from my senses take all feeling else
> Save what beats there,"

yet it is also true, that sometimes, in the midst of its greatest pain, the mind takes marvellous notice of the smallest things that happen around it. This involves a law of which illustrations could be plentifully adduced from Shakespeare himself, namely, that the intellectual part of the mind can go on working with strange independence of the emotional.

From the door of the mill, as from a sepulchral cavern, blew a cold wind like the very breath of death upon me, just when that pang shot, in absolute pain, through my heart. For a wind had arisen from behind the mill, and we were in its shelter save where a window behind and the door beside me allowed free passage to the first of the coming storm.

I believe I turned away from the old man without a word. He made no attempt to detain me. Whether he went back into his closet, the old mill, sacred in the eyes of the Father who honours his children, even as the church wherein many prayers went up to Him, or turned homeward to his cottage and his sleeping wife, I cannot tell. The first I remember after that cold wind is, that I was fighting with that wind, gathered even to a storm, upon the common where I had dealt so severely with her who had this very night gone into that region into which, as into a waveless sea, all the rivers of life rush and are silent. Is it the sea of death? No. The sea of life—a life too keen, too refined, for our senses to know it, and therefore we call it death—because we cannot lay hold upon it.

I will not dwell upon my thoughts as I wandered about over that waste. The wind had risen to a storm charged with fierce showers of stinging hail, which gave a look of gray wrath to the invisible wind as it swept slanting by, and then danced and scudded along the levels. The next point in that night of pain is when I found myself standing at the iron gate of Oldcastle Hall. I had left the common, passed my own house and the church, crossed the river, walked through the village, and was restored to self-consciousness—that is, I knew that I was there—only when first I stood in the shelter of one of those great pillars and the monster on its top. Finding the gate open, for they were not precise about having it fastened, I pushed it and entered. The wind was roaring in the trees as I think I have never heard it roar since; for the hail clashed upon the bare branches and twigs, and mingled an unearthly hiss with the roar. In the midst of it the house stood like a tomb, dark, silent, without one dim light to show that sleep and not death ruled within. I could have fancied that there were no windows in it, that it stood, like an eyeless skull, in that gaunt forest of skeleton trees, empty and desolate, beaten by the ungenial hail, the dead rain of the country of death. I passed round to the other side, stepping gently lest some ear might be awake—as if any ear, even that of Judy's white wolf, could have heard the loudest step in such a storm. I heard the hailstones crush between my feet and the soft grass of the lawn, but I dared not stop to look up at the back of the house. I went on to the staircase in the rock, and by its rude steps, dangerous in the flapping of such storm-wings as swept about it that night, descended to the little grove below, around the deep-walled pool. Here the wind did not reach me. It roared overhead, but, save an occasional sigh, as if of sympathy with their suffering brethren abroad in the world, the hermits of this cell stood upright and still around the sleeping water. But my heart was a well in which a storm boiled and raged; and all that "pother o'er my head" was peace itself compared to what I felt. I sat down on the seat at the foot of a tree, where I had first seen Miss Oldcastle reading. And then I looked up to the house. Yes, there was a light there! It must be in her window. She, then, could not rest any more than I. Sleep was driven from her eyes because she must wed the man she would not; while sleep was driven from mine because I could not marry the woman I would. Was that it? No. My heart acquitted me, in part at least, of thinking only of my own sorrow in the presence of her greater distress. Gladly would I have given her up for ever, without a hope, to redeem her from such a bondage. "But it would be to marry another some day," suggested the tormentor within. And then the storm, which had a little abated, broke out afresh in my soul. But before I rose from her seat I was ready even for that—at least I thought so—if only I might deliver her from the all but destruction that seemed to be impending over her. The same moment in which my mind seemed to have arrived at the possibility of such a resolution, I rose almost involuntarily, and glancing once more at the dull light in her window—for I did not doubt that it was her window, though it was much too dark to discern the shape of the house—almost felt my way to the stair, and climbed again into the storm.

But I was quieter now, and able to go home. It must have been nearly morning, though at this season of the year the morning is undefined, when I reached my own house. My sister had gone to bed, for I could always let myself in; nor, indeed, did any one in Marshmallows think the locking of the door at night an imperative duty.

When I fell asleep, I was again in the old quarry, staring into the deep well. I thought Mrs. Oldcastle was murdering her daughter in the house above, while I was spell-bound to the spot, where if I stood long enough, I should see her body float into the well from the subterranean passage, the opening of which was just below where I stood. I was thus confusing and reconstructing the two dreadful stories of the place—that told me by old Weir, about the circumstances of his birth; and that told me by Dr. Duncan, about Mrs. Oldcastle's treatment of her elder daughter. But as a white hand and arm appeared in the water below me, sorrow and pity more than horror broke the bonds of sleep, and I awoke to less trouble than that of my dreams, only because that which I feared had not yet come.

XXX.

It was the Sabbath morn. But such a Sabbath! The day seemed all wan with weeping, and gray with care. The wind dashed itself against the casement, laden with soft heavy sleet. The ground, the bushes, the very outhouses seemed sodden with the rain. The trees, which looked stricken as if they could die of grief, were yet tormented with fear, for the bare branches went streaming out in the torrent of the wind, as cowering before the invisible foe. The first thing I knew when I awoke was the raving of that wind. I could lie in bed not a moment longer. I could not rest. But how was I to do the work of my office? When a man's duty looks like an enemy, dragging him into the dark mountains, he has no less to go with it than when, like a friend with loving face, it offers to lead him along green pastures by the river-side. I had little power over my feelings; I could not prevent my mind from mirroring itself in the nature around me; but I could address myself to the work I had to do. "My God!" was all the prayer I could pray ere I descended to join my sister at the breakfast table. But He knew what lay behind the one word.

Martha could not help seeing that something was the matter. I saw by her looks that she could read so much in mine. But her eyes alone questioned me, and that only by glancing at me anxiously from time to time. I was grateful to her for saying nothing. It is a fine thing in friendship to know when to be silent.

The prayers were before me, in the hands of all my friends, and in the hearts of some of them; and if I could not enter into them as I would, I could yet read them humbly before God as his servant to help the people to worship as one flock. But how was I to preach? I had been in difficulty before now, but never in so much. How was I to teach others whose mind was one confusion? The subject on which I was pondering when young Weir came to tell me his sister was dying, had retreated as if into the far past; it seemed as if years had come between that time and this, though but one black night had rolled by. To attempt to speak upon that would have been vain, for I had nothing to say on the matter now. And if I could have recalled my former thoughts, I should have felt a hypocrite as I delivered them, so utterly dissociated would they have been from anything that I was thinking or feeling now. Here would have been my visible form and audible voice, uttering that as present to me now, as felt by me now, which I did think and feel yesterday, but which, although I believed it, was not present to my feeling or heart, and must wait the revolution of months, or it might be of years, before I should feel it again, before I should be able to exhort my people about it with the fervour of a present faith. But, indeed, I could not even recall what I had thought and felt. Should I then tell them that I could not speak to them that morning?—There would be nothing wrong in that. But I felt ashamed of yielding to personal trouble when the truths of God were all about me, although I could not feel them. Might not some hungry soul go away without being satisfied, because I was faint and down-hearted? I confess I had a desire likewise to avoid giving rise to speculation and talk about myself, a desire which, although not wrong, could neither have strengthened me to speak the truth, nor have justified me in making the attempt.—What was to be done?

All at once the remembrance crossed my mind of a sermon I had preached before upon the words of St. Paul: "Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself?" a subject suggested by the fact that on the preceding Sunday I had especially felt, in preaching to my people, that I was exhorting myself whose necessity was greater than theirs—at least I felt it to be greater than I could know theirs to be. And now the converse of the thought came to me, and I said to myself: "Might I not try the other way now, and preach to myself? In teaching myself, might I not teach others? Would it not hold? I am very troubled and faithless now. If I knew that God was going to lay the full weight of this grief upon me, yet if I loved Him with all my heart, should I not at least be more quiet? There would not be a storm within me then, as if the Father had descended from the throne of the heavens, and 'chaos were come again.' Let me expostulate with myself in my heart, and the words of my expostulation will not be the less true with my people."

All this passed through my mind as I sat in my study after breakfast, with the great old cedar roaring before my window. It was within an hour of church-time. I took my Bible, read and thought, got even some comfort already, and found myself in my vestry not quite unwilling to read the prayers and speak to my people.

There were very few present. The day was one of the worst—violently stormy, which harmonized somewhat with my feelings; and, to my further relief, the Hall-pew was empty. Instead of finding myself a mere minister to the prayers of others, I found, as I read, that my heart went out in crying to God for the divine presence of his spirit. And if I thought more of myself in my prayers than was well, yet as soon as I was converted, would I not strengthen my brethren? And the sermon I preached to myself and through myself to my people, was that which the stars had preached to me, and thereby driven me to my knees by the mill-door. I took for my text "The glory of the Lord shall be revealed;" and then I proceeded to show them how the glory of the Lord was to be revealed. I preached to myself that throughout this fortieth chapter of the prophecies of Isaiah, the power of God is put side by side with the weakness of men, not that He, the perfect, may glory over his feeble children; not that He may say to them—"Look how mighty I am, and go down upon your knees and worship"—for power alone was never yet worthy of prayer; but that He may say thus: "Look, my children, you will never be strong but with my strength. I have no other to give you. And that you can get only by trusting in me. I cannot give it you any other way. There is no other way. But can you not trust in me? Look how strong I am. You wither like the grass. Do not fear. Let the grass wither. Lay hold of my word, that which I say to you out of my truth, and that will be life in you that the blowing of the wind that withers cannot reach. I am coming with my strong hand and my judging arm to do my work. And what is the work of my strong hand and ruling arm? To feed my flock like a shepherd, to gather the lambs with my arm, and carry them in my bosom, and gently lead those that are with young. I have measured the waters in the hollow of my hand, and held the mountains in my scales, to give each his due weight, and all the nations, so strong and fearful in your eyes, are as nothing beside my strength and what I can do. Do not think of me as of an image that your hands can make, a thing you can choose to serve and for which you can do things to win its favour. I am before and above the earth, and over your life, and your oppressors I will wither with my breath. I come to you with help. I need no worship from you. But I say love me, for love is life, and I love you. Look at the stars I have made. I know every one of them. Not one goes wrong, because I keep him right. Why sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest, O Israel—My way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God! I give power to the faint, and to them that have no might, plenty of strength."

"Thus," I went on to say, "God brings his strength to destroy our weakness by making us strong. This is a God indeed! Shall we not trust Him?"

I gave my people this paraphrase of the chapter, to help them to see the meanings which their familiarity with the words, and their non-familiarity with the modes of Eastern thought, and the forms of Eastern expression, would unite to prevent them from catching more than broken glimmerings of. And then I tried to show them that it was in the commonest troubles of life, as well as in the spiritual fears and perplexities that came upon them, that they were to trust in God; for God made the outside as well as the inside, and they altogether belonged to Him; and that when outside things, such as pain or loss of work, or difficulty in getting money, were referred to God and his will, they too straightway became spiritual affairs, for nothing in the world could any longer appear common or unclean to the man who saw God in everything. But I told them they must not be too anxious to be delivered from that which troubled them; but they ought to be anxious to have the presence of God with them to support them, and make them able in patience to possess their souls; and so the trouble would work its end—the purification of their minds that the light and gladness of God and all his earth, which the pure in heart and the meek alone could inherit, might shine in upon them. And then I repeated to them this portion of a prayer out of one of Sir Philip Sidney's books:—

"O Lord, I yield unto thy will, and joyfully embrace what sorrow thou wilt have me suffer. Only thus much let me crave of thee (let my craving, O Lord, be accepted of thee, since even that proceeds from thee), let me crave, even by the noblest title, which in my greatest affliction I may give myself, that I am thy creature, and by thy goodness (which is thyself) that thou wilt suffer some beam of thy majesty so to shine into my mind, that it may still depend confidently on thee."

All the time I was speaking, the rain, mingled with sleet, was dashing against the windows, and the wind was howling over the graves all about. But the dead were not troubled by the storm; and over my head, from beam to beam of the roof, now resting on one, now flitting to another, a sparrow kept flying, which had taken refuge in the church till the storm should cease and the sun shine out in the great temple. "This," I said aloud, "is what the church is for: as the sparrow finds there a house from the storm, so the human heart escapes thither to hear the still small voice of God when its faith is too weak to find Him in the storm, and in the sorrow, and in the pain." And while I spoke, a dim watery gleam fell on the chancel-floor, and the comfort of the sun awoke in my heart. Nor let any one call me superstitious for taking that pale sun-ray of hope as sent to me; for I received it as comfort for the race, and for me as one of the family, even as the bow that was set in the cloud, a promise to the eyes of light for them that sit in darkness. As I write, my eye falls upon the Bible on the table by my side, and I read the words, "For the Lord God is a sun and shield, the Lord will give grace and glory." And I lift my eyes from my paper, and look abroad from my window, and the sun is shining in its strength. The leaves are dancing in the light wind that gives them each its share of the sun, and my trouble has passed away for ever, like the storm of that night and the unrest of that strange Sabbath.

Such comforts would come to us oftener from Nature, if we really believed that our God was the God of Nature; that when He made, or rather when He makes, He means; that not his hands only, but his heart too, is in the making of those things; that, therefore, the influences of Nature upon human minds and hearts are because He intended them. And if we believe that our God is everywhere, why should we not think Him present even in the coincidences that sometimes seem so strange? For, if He be in the things that coincide, He must be in the coincidence of those things.

Miss Oldcastle told me once that she could not take her eyes off a butterfly which was flitting about in the church all the time I was speaking of the resurrection of the dead. I told the people that in Greek there was one word for the soul and for a butterfly—Psyche; that I thought as the light on the rain made the natural symbol of mercy—the rainbow, so the butterfly was the type in nature, and made to the end, amongst other ends, of being such a type—of the resurrection of the human body; that its name certainly expressed the hope of the Greeks in immortality, while to us it speaks likewise of a glorified body, whereby we shall know and love each other with our eyes as well as our hearts.—My sister saw the butterfly too, but only remembered that she had seen it when it was mentioned in her hearing: on her the sight made no impression; she saw no coincidence.

I descended from the pulpit comforted by the sermon I had preached to myself. But I was glad to feel justified in telling my people that, in consequence of the continued storm, for there had been no more of sunshine than just that watery gleam, there would be no service in the afternoon, and that I would instead visit some of my sick poor, whom the weather might have discomposed in their poor dwellings.

The people were very slow in dispersing. There was so much putting-on of clogs, gathering up of skirts over the head, and expanding of umbrellas, soon to be taken down again as worse than useless in the violence of the wind, that the porches were crowded, and the few left detained in the church till the others made way. I lingered with these. They were all poor people.

"I am sorry you will have such a wet walk home," I said to Mrs. Baird, the wife of old Reginald Baird, the shoemaker, a little wizened creature, with more wrinkles than hairs, who the older and more withered she grew, seemed, like the kernels of some nuts, only to grow the sweeter.

"It's very good of you to let us off this afternoon, sir. Not as I minds the wet: it finds out the holes in people's shoes, and gets my husband into more work."

This was, in fact, the response of the shoemaker's wife to my sermon. If we look for responses after our fashion instead of after people's own fashion, we ought to be disappointed. Any recognition of truth, whatever form it may take, whether that of poetic delight, intellectual corroboration, practical commonplace, or even vulgar aphorism, must be welcomed by the husbandmen of the God of growth. A response which jars against the peculiar pitch of our mental instrument, must not therefore be turned away from with dislike. Our mood of the moment is not that by which the universe is tuned into its harmonies. We must drop our instrument and listen to the other, and if we find that the player upon it is breathing after a higher expression; is, after his fashion, striving to embody something he sees of the same truth the utterance of which called forth this his answer, let us thank God and take courage. God at least is pleased; and if our refinement and education take away from our pleasure, it is because of something low, false, and selfish, not divine in a word, that is mingled with that refinement and that education. If the shoemaker's wife's response to the prophet's grand poem about the care of God over his creatures, took the form of acknowledgment for the rain that found out the holes in the people's shoes, it was the more genuine and true, for in itself it afforded proof that it was not a mere reflex of the words of the prophet, but sprung from the experience and recognition of the shoemaker's wife. Nor was there anything necessarily selfish in it, for if there are holes in people's shoes, the sooner they are found out the better.

While I was talking to Mrs. Baird, Mr. Stoddart, whose love for the old organ had been stronger than his dislike to the storm, had come down into the church, and now approached me.

"I never saw you in the church before, Mr. Stoddart," I said, "though I have heard you often enough. You use your own private door always."

"I thought to go that way now, but there came such a fierce burst of wind and rain in my face, that my courage failed me, and I turned back—like the sparrow—for refuge in the church."

"A thought strikes me," I said. "Come home with me, and have some lunch, and then we will go together to see some of my poor people. I have often wished to ask you."

His face fell.

"It is such a day!" he answered, remonstratingly, but not positively refusing. It was not his way ever to refuse anything positively.

"So it was when you set out this morning," I returned; "but you would not deprive us of the aid of your music for the sake of a charge of wind, and a rattle of rain-drops."

"But I shan't be of any use. You are going, and that is enough."

"I beg your pardon. Your very presence will be of use. Nothing yet given him or done for him by his fellow, ever did any man so much good as the recognition of the brotherhood by the common signs of friendship and sympathy. The best good of given money depends on the degree to which it is the sign of that friendship and sympathy. Our Lord did not make little of visiting: 'I was sick and ye visited me.' 'Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me.' Of course, if the visitor goes professionally and not humanly,—as a mere religious policeman, that is—whether he only distributes tracts with condescending words, or gives money liberally because he thinks he ought, the more he does not go the better, for he only does harm to them and himself too."

"But I cannot pretend to feel any of the interest you consider essential: why then should I go?"

"To please me, your friend. That is a good human reason. You need not say a word—you must not pretend anything. Go as my companion, not as their visitor. Will you come?"

"I suppose I must."

"You must, then. Thank you. You will help me. I have seldom a companion."

So when the storm-fit had abated for the moment, we hurried to the vicarage, had a good though hasty lunch, (to which I was pleased to see Mr. Stoddart do justice; for it is with man as with beast, if you want work out of him, he must eat well—and it is the one justification of eating well, that a man works well upon it,) and set out for the village. The rain was worse than ever. There was no sleet, and the wind was not cold, but the windows of heaven were opened, and if the fountains of the great deep were not broken up, it looked like it, at least, when we reached the bridge and saw how the river had spread out over all the low lands on its borders. We could not talk much as we went along.

"Don't you find some pleasure in fighting the wind?" I said.

"I have no doubt I should," answered Mr. Stoddart, "if I thought I were going to do any good; but as it is, to tell the truth, I would rather be by my own fire with my folio Dante on the reading desk."

"Well, I would rather help the poorest woman in creation, than contemplate the sufferings of the greatest and wickedest," I said.

"There are two things you forget," returned Mr. Stoddart. "First, that the poem of Dante is not nearly occupied with the sufferings of the wicked; and next, that what I have complained of in this expedition, which as far as I am concerned I would call a wild-goose-chase were it not that it is your doing and not mine, is that I am not going to help any body."

"You would have the best of the argument entirely," I replied, "if your expectation was sure to turn out correct."

As I spoke, we had come within a few yards of the Tomkins's cottage, which lay low down from the village towards the river, and I saw that the water was at the threshold. I turned to Mr. Stoddart, who, to do him justice, had not yet grumbled in the least.

"Perhaps you had better go home, after all," I said; "for you must wade into Tomkins's if you go at all. Poor old man! what can he be doing, with his wife dying, and the river in his house!"

"You have constituted yourself my superior officer, Mr. Walton. I never turned my back on my leader yet. Though I confess I wish I could see the enemy a little clearer."

"There is the enemy," I said, pointing to the water, and walking into it.

Mr. Stoddart followed me without a moment's hesitation.

When I opened the door, the first thing I saw was a small stream of water running straight from the door to the fire on the hearth, which it had already drowned. The old man was sitting by his wife's bedside. Life seemed rapidly going from the old woman. She lay breathing very hard.

"Oh, sir," said the old man, as he rose, almost crying, "you're come at last!"

"Did you send for me?" I asked.

"No, sir. I had nobody to send. Leastways, I asked the Lord if he wouldn't fetch you. I've been prayin' hard for you for the last hour. I couldn't leave her to come for you. And I do believe the wind 'ud ha' blown me off my two old legs."

"Well, I am come, you see. I would have come sooner, but I had no idea you would be flooded."

"It's not that I mind, sir, though it is cold sin' the fire went. But she is goin' now, sir. She ha'n't spoken a word this two hours and more, and her breathin's worse and worse. She don't know me now, sir."

A moan of protestation came from the dying woman.

"She does know you, and loves you too, Tomkins," I said. "And you'll both know each other better by-and-by."

The old woman made a feeble motion with her hand. I took it in mine. It was cold and deathlike. The rain was falling in large slow drops from the roof upon the bed-clothes. But she would be beyond the reach of all the region storms before long, and it did not matter much.

"Look if you can find a basin or plate, Mr. Stoddart, and put it to catch the drop here," I said.

For I wanted to give him the first chance of being useful.

"There's one in the press there," said the old man, rising feebly.

"Keep your seat," said Mr. Stoddart. "I'll get it."

And he got a basin from the cupboard, and put it on the bed to catch the drop.

The old woman held my hand in hers; but by its motion I knew that she wanted something; and guessing what it was from what she had said before, I made her husband sit on the bed on the other side of her and take hold of her other hand, while I took his place on the chair by the bedside. This seemed to content her. So I went and whispered to Mr. Stoddart, who had stood looking on disconsolately:—

"You heard me say I would visit some of my sick people this afternoon. Some will be expecting me with certainty. You must go instead of me, and tell them that I cannot come, because old Mrs. Tomkins is dying; but I will see them soon."

He seemed rather relieved at the commission. I gave him the necessary directions to find the cottages, and he left me.

I may mention here that this was the beginning of a relation between Mr. Stoddart and the poor of the parish—a very slight one indeed, at first, for it consisted only in his knowing two or three of them, so as to ask after their health when he met them, and give them an occasional half-crown. But it led to better things before many years had passed. It seems scarcely more than yesterday—though it is twenty years ago—that I came upon him in the avenue, standing in dismay over the fragments of a jug of soup which he had dropped, to the detriment of his trousers as well as the loss of his soup. "What am I to do?" he said. "Poor Jones expects his soup to-day."—"Why, go back, and get some more."—"But what will cook say?" The poor man was more afraid of the cook than he would have been of a squadron of cavalry. "Never mind the cook. Tell her you must have some more as soon as it can be got ready." He stood uncertain for a moment. Then his face brightened. "I will tell her I want my luncheon. I always have soup. And I'll get out through the greenhouse, and carry it to Jones."—"Very well," I said; "that will do capitally." And I went on, without caring to disturb my satisfaction by determining whether the devotion of his own soup arose more from love to Jones, or fear of the cook. He was a great help to me in the latter part of his life, especially after I lost good Dr. Duncan, and my beloved friend Old Rogers. He was just one of those men who make excellent front-rank men, but are quite unfit for officers. He could do what he was told without flinching, but he always required to be told.

I resumed my seat by the bedside, where the old woman was again moaning. As soon as I took her hand she ceased, and so I sat till it began to grow dark.

"Are you there, sir?" she would murmur.

"Yes, I am here. I have a hold of your hand."

"I can't feel you, sir."

"But you can hear me. And you can hear God's voice in your heart. I am here, though you can't feel me. And God is here, though you can't see him."

She would be silent for a while, and then murmur again—

"Are you there, Tomkins?"

"Yes, my woman, I'm here," answered the old man to one of these questions; "but I wish I was there instead, wheresomever it be as you're goin', old girl."

And all that I could hear of her answer was, "Bym by; bym by."

Why should I linger over the death-bed of an illiterate woman, old and plain, dying away by inches? Is it only that she died with a hold of my hand, and that therefore I am interested in the story? I trust not. I was interested in her. Why? Would my readers be more interested if I told them of the death of a young lovely creature, who said touching things, and died amidst a circle of friends, who felt that the very light of life was being taken away from them? It was enough for me that here was a woman with a heart like my own; who needed the same salvation I needed; to whom the love of God was the one blessed thing; who was passing through the same dark passage into the light that the Lord had passed through before her, that I had to pass through after her. She had no theories—at least, she gave utterance to none; she had few thoughts of her own—and gave still fewer of them expression; you might guess at a true notion in her mind, but an abstract idea she could scarcely lay hold of; her speech was very common; her manner rather brusque than gentle; but she could love; she could forget herself; she could be sorry for what she did or thought wrong; she could hope; she could wish to be better; she could admire good people; she could trust in God her Saviour. And now the loving God-made human heart in her was going into a new school that it might begin a fresh beautiful growth. She was old, I have said, and plain; but now her old age and plainness were about to vanish, and all that had made her youth attractive to young Tomkins was about to return to her, only rendered tenfold more beautiful by the growth of fifty years of learning according to her ability. God has such patience in working us into vessels of honour! in teaching us to be children! And shall we find the human heart in which the germs of all that is noblest and loveliest and likest to God have begun to grow and manifest themselves, uninteresting, because its circumstances have been narrow, bare, and poverty-stricken, though neither sordid nor unclean; because the woman is old and wrinkled and brown, as if these were more than the transient accidents of humanity; because she has neither learned grammar nor philosophy; because her habits have neither been delicate nor self-indulgent? To help the mind of such a woman to unfold to the recognition of the endless delights of truth; to watch the dawn of the rising intelligence upon the too still face, and the transfiguration of the whole form, as the gentle rusticity vanishes in yet gentler grace, is a labour and a delight worth the time and mind of an archangel. Our best living poet says—but no; I will not quote. It is a distinct wrong that befalls the best books to have many of their best words quoted till in their own place and connection they cease to have force and influence. The meaning of the passage is that the communication of truth is one of the greatest delights the human heart can experience. Surely this is true. Does not the teaching of men form a great part of the divine gladness?

Therefore even the dull approaches of death are full of deep significance and warm interest to one who loves his fellows, who desires not to be distinguished by any better fate than theirs; and shrinks from the pride of supposing that his own death, or that of the noblest of the good, is more precious in the sight of God than that of "one of the least of these little ones."

At length, after a long silence, the peculiar sounds of obstructed breathing indicated the end at hand. The jaw fell, and the eyes were fixed. The old man closed the mouth and the eyes of his old companion, weeping like a child, and I prayed aloud, giving thanks to God for taking her to himself. It went to my heart to leave the old man alone with the dead; but it was better to let him be alone for a while, ere the women should come to do the last offices for the abandoned form.

I went to Old Rogers, told him the state in which I had left poor Tomkins, and asked him what was to be done.

"I'll go and bring him home, sir, directly. He can't be left there."

"But how can you bring him in such a night?"

"Let me see, sir. I must think. Would your mare go in a cart, do you think?"

"Quite quietly. She brought a load of gravel from the common a few days ago. But where's your cart? I haven't got one."

"There's one at Weir's to be repaired, sir. It wouldn't be stealing to borrow it."

How he managed with Tomkins, I do not know. I thought it better to leave all the rest to him. He only said afterwards, that he could hardly get the old man away from the body. But when I went in next day, I found Tomkins sitting, disconsolate, but as comfortable as he could be, in the easy chair by the side of the fire. Mrs. Rogers was bustling about cheerily. The storm had died in the night. The sun was shining. It was the first of the spring weather. The whole country was gleaming with water. But soon it would sink away, and the grass be the thicker for its rising.

XXXI.

My reader will easily believe that I returned home that Sunday evening somewhat jaded, nor will he be surprised if I say that next morning I felt disinclined to leave my bed. I was able, however, to rise and go, as I have said, to Old Rogers's cottage.

But when I came home, I could no longer conceal from myself that I was in danger of a return of my last attack. I had been sitting for hours in wet clothes, with my boots full of water, and now I had to suffer for it. But as I was not to blame in the matter, and had no choice offered me whether I should be wet or dry while I sat by the dying woman, I felt no depression at the prospect of the coming illness. Indeed, I was too much depressed from other causes, from mental strife and hopelessness, to care much whether I was well or ill. I could have welcomed death in the mood in which I sometimes found myself during the next few days, when I was unable to leave my bed, and knew that Captain Everard was at the Hall, and knew nothing besides. For no voice reached me from that quarter any more than if Oldcastle Hall had been a region beyond the grave. Miss Oldcastle seemed to have vanished from my ken as much as Catherine Weir and Mrs. Tomkins—yes, more—for there was only death between these and me; whereas, there was something far worse—I could not always tell what—that rose ever between Miss Oldcastle and myself, and paralysed any effort I might fancy myself on the point of making for her rescue.

One pleasant thing happened. On the Thursday, I think it was, I felt better. My sister came into my room and said that Miss Crowther had called, and wanted to see me.

"Which Miss Crowther is it?" I asked.

"A little lady, that looks like a bird, and chirps when she talks.

Of course I was no longer in any doubt as to which of them it was.

"You told her I had a bad cold, did you not?"

"Oh, yes. But she says if it is only a cold, it will do you no harm to see her."

"But you told her I was in bed, didn't you?"

"Of course. But it makes no difference. She says she's used to seeing sick folk in bed; and if you don't mind seeing her, she doesn't mind seeing you."

"Well, I suppose I must see her."

So my sister made me a little tidier, and introduced Miss Crowther.

"O dear Mr. Walton, I am so sorry! But you're not very ill, are you?"

"I hope not, Miss Jemima. Indeed, I begin to think this morning that I am going to get off easier than I expected."

"I am glad of that. Now listen to me. I won't keep you, and it is a matter of some importance. I hear that one of your people is dead, a young woman of the name of Weir, who has left a little boy behind her. Now, I have been wanting for a long time to adopt a child——"

"But," I interrupted her, "what would Miss Hester say?"

"My sister is not so very dreadful as perhaps you think her, Mr. Walton; and besides, when I do want my own way very particularly, which is not often, for there are not so many things that it's worth while insisting upon—but when I do want my own way, I always have it. I then stand upon my right of—what do you call it?—primo—primogeniture—that's it! Well, I think I know something of this child's father. I am sorry to say I don't know much good of him, and that's the worse for the boy. Still——"

"The boy is an uncommonly sweet and lovable child, whoever was his father," I interposed.

"I am very glad to hear it. I am the more determined to adopt him. What friends has he?"

"He has a grandfather, and an uncle and aunt, and will have a godfather—that's me—in a few days, I hope."

"I am very glad to hear it. There will be no opposition on the part of the relatives, I presume?"

"I am not so sure of that. I fear I shall object for one, Miss Jemima."

"You? I didn't expect that of you, Mr. Walton, I must say."

And there was a tremor in the old lady's voice more of disappointment and hurt than of anger.

"I will think it over, though, and talk about it to his grandfather, and we shall find out what's best, I do hope. You must not think I should not like you to have him."

"Thank you, Mr. Walton. Then I won't stay longer now. But I warn you I will call again very soon, if you don't come to see me. Good morning."

And the dear old lady shook hands with me and left me rather hurriedly, turning at the door, however, to add—

"Mind, I've set my heart upon having the boy, Mr. Walton. I've seen him often."

What could have made Miss Crowther take such a fancy to the boy? I could not help associating it with what I had heard of her youthful disappointment, but never having had my conjectures confirmed, I will say no more about them. Of course I talked the matter over with Thomas Weir; but, as I had suspected, I found that he was now as unwilling to part with the boy as he had formerly disliked the sight of him. Nor did I press the matter at all, having a belief that the circumstances of one's natal position are not to be rudely handled or thoughtlessly altered, besides that I thought Thomas and his daughter ought to have all the comfort and good that were to be got from the presence of the boy whose advent had occasioned them so much trouble and sorrow, yea and sin too. But I did not give a positive and final refusal to Miss Crowther. I only said "for the present;" for I did not feel at liberty to go farther. I thought that such changes might take place as would render the trial of such a new relationship desirable; as, indeed, it turned out in the end, though I cannot tell the story now.

I have, I think, entirely as yet, followed, in these memoirs, the plan of relating those things only in which I was personally concerned. I will now depart from this plan—for once. Years passed before some of the following facts were reported to me, but it is only here that they could be interesting to my readers.

At the very time Miss Crowther was with me, as nearly as I can guess, Old Rogers turned into Thomas Weir's workshop. The usual, on the present occasion somewhat melancholy, greetings having passed between them, Old Rogers said—

"Don't you think, Mr. Weir, there's summat the matter wi' parson!"

"Overworked," returned Weir. "He's lost two, ye see, and had to see them both safe over, as I may say, within the same day. He's got a bad cold, I'm sorry to hear, besides. Have ye heard of him to-day?"

"Yes, yes; he's badly, and in bed. But that's not what I mean. There's summat on his mind," said Old Rogers.

"Well, I don't think it's for you or me to meddle with parson's mind," returned Weir.

"I'm not so sure o' that," persisted Rogers. "But if I hadn't thought, Mr. Weir, as how you would be ready to take me up short for mentionin' of the thing, I wouldn't ha' opened my mouth to you about parson—leastways, in that way, I mean."

"But what way do you mean, Old Rogers?"

"Why, about his in'ards, you know."

"I'm no nearer your meanin' yet."

"Well, Mr. Weir, you and me's two old fellows, now—leastways I'm a deal older than you. But that doesn't signify to what I want to say."

And here Old Rogers stuck fast—according to Weir's story.

"It don't seem easy to say no how, Old Rogers," said Weir.

"Well, it aint. So I must just let it go by the run, and hope the parson, who'll never know, would forgive me if he did."

"Well, then, what is it?"

"It's my opinion that that parson o' ours—you see, we knows about it, Mr. Weir, though we're not gentlefolks—leastways, I'm none."

"Now, what do you mean, Old Rogers?"

"Well, I means this—as how parson's in love. There, that's paid out."

"Suppose he was, I don't see yet what business that is of yours or mine either."

"Well, I do. I'd go to Davie Jones for that man."

A heathenish expression, perhaps; but Weir assured me, with much amusement in his tone, that those were the very words Old Rogers used. Leaving the expression aside, will the reader think for a moment on the old man's reasoning? My condition was his business; for he was ready to die for me! Ah! love does indeed make us all each other's keeper, just as we were intended to be.

"But what can we do?" returned Weir.

Perhaps he was the less inclined to listen to the old man, that he was busy with a coffin for his daughter, who was lying dead down the street. And so my poor affairs were talked of over the coffin-planks. Well, well, it was no bad omen.

"I tell you what, Mr. Weir, this here's a serious business. And it seems to me it's not shipshape o' you to go on with that plane o' yours, when we're talkin' about parson."

"Well, Old Rogers, I meant no offence. Here goes. Now, what have you to say? Though if it's offence to parson you're speakin' of, I know, if I were parson, who I'd think was takin' the greatest liberty, me wi' my plane, or you wi' your fancies."

"Belay there, and hearken."

So Old Rogers went into as many particulars as he thought fit, to prove that his suspicion as to the state of my mind was correct; which particulars I do not care to lay in a collected form before my reader, he being in no need of such a summing up to give his verdict, seeing the parson has already pleaded guilty. When he had finished,

"Supposing all you say, Old Rogers," remarked Thomas, "I don't yet see what we've got to do with it. Parson ought to know best what he's about."

"But my daughter tells me," said Rogers, "that Miss Oldcastle has no mind to marry Captain Everard. And she thinks if parson would only speak out he might have a chance."

Weir made no reply, and was silent so long, with his head bent, that Rogers grew impatient.

"Well, man, ha' you nothing to say now—not for your best friend—on earth, I mean—and that's parson? It may seem a small matter to you, but it's no small matter to parson."

"Small to me!" said Weir, and taking up his tool, a constant recourse with him when agitated, he began to plane furiously.

Old Rogers now saw that there was more in it than he had thought, and held his peace and waited. After a minute or two of fierce activity, Thomas lifted up a face more white than the deal-board he was planing, and said,

"You should have come to the point a little sooner, Old Rogers."

He then laid down his plane, and went out of the workshop, leaving Rogers standing there in bewilderment. But he was not gone many minutes. He returned with a letter in his hand.

"There," he said, giving it to Rogers.

"I can't read hand o' write," returned Rogers. "I ha' enough ado with straight-foret print. But I'll take it to parson."

"On no account," returned Thomas, emphatically. "That's not what I gave it you for. Neither you nor parson has any right to read that letter; and I don't want either of you to read it. Can Jane read writing?"

"I don't know as she can, for, you see, what makes lasses take to writin' is when their young man's over the seas, leastways not in the mill over the brook."

"I'll be back in a minute," said Thomas, and taking the letter from Rogers's hand, he left the shop again.

He returned once more with the letter sealed up in an envelope, addressed to Miss Oldcastle.

"Now, you tell your Jane to give that to Miss Oldcastle from me—mind, from me; and she must give it into her own hands, and let no one else see it. And I must have it again. Mind you tell her all that, Old Rogers."

"I will. It's for Miss Oldcastle, and no one else to know on't. And you're to have it again all safe when done with."

"Yes. Can you trust Jane not to go talking about it?"

"I think I can. I ought to, anyhow. But she can't know anythink in the letter now, Mr. Weir."

"I know that; but Marshmallows is a talkin' place. And poor Kate aint right out o' hearin' yet.—You'll come and see her buried to-morrow, won't ye, Old Rogers?"

"I will, Thomas. You've had a troubled life, but thank God the sun came out a bit before she died."

"That's true, Rogers. It's all right, I do think, though I grumbled sore. But Jane mustn't speak of that letter."

"No. That she shan't."

"I'll tell you some day what's in it. But I can't bear to talk about it yet."

And so they parted.

I was too unwell still either to be able to bury my dead out of my sight or to comfort my living the next Sunday. I got help from Addicehead, however, and the dead bodies were laid aside in the ancient wardrobe of the tomb. They were both buried by my vestry-door, Catherine where I had found young Tom lying, namely, in the grave of her mother, and old Mrs. Tomkins on the other side of the path.

On Sunday, Rogers gave his daughter the letter, and she carried it to the Hall. It was not till she had to wait on her mistress before leaving her for the night that she found an opportunity of giving it into her own hands.

Then when her bell rang, Jane went up to her room, and found her so pale and haggard that she was frightened. She had thrown herself back on the couch, with her hands lying by her sides, as if she cared for nothing in this world or out of it. But when Jane entered, she started and sat up, and tried to look like herself. Her face, however, was so pitiful, that honest-hearted Jane could not help crying, upon which the responsive sisterhood overcame the proud lady, and she cried too. Jane had all but forgotten the letter, of the import of which she had no idea, for her father had taken care to rouse no suspicions in her mind. But when she saw her cry, the longing to give her something, which comes to us all when we witness trouble—for giving seems to mean everything—brought to her mind the letter she had undertaken to deliver to her. Now she had no notion, as I have said, that the letter had anything to do with her present perplexity, but she hoped it might divert her thoughts for a moment, which is all that love at a distance can look for sometimes.

"Here is a letter," said Jane, "that Mr. Weir the carpenter gave to my father to give to me to bring to you, miss."

"What is it about, Jane?" she asked listlessly.

Then a sudden flash broke from her eyes, and she held out her hand eagerly to take it. She opened it and read it with changing colour, but when she had finished it, her cheeks were crimson, and her eyes glowing like fire.

"The wretch!" she said, and threw the letter from her into the middle of the floor.

Jane, who remembered the injunctions of her father as to the safety and return of the letter, stooped to pick it up; but had hardly raised herself when the door opened, and in came Mrs. Oldcastle. The moment she saw her mother, Ethelwyn rose, and advancing to meet her, said,

"Mother, I will not marry that man. You may do what you please with me, but I will not."

"Heigho!" exclaimed Mrs. Oldcastle with spread nostrils, and turning suddenly upon Jane, snatched the letter out of her hand.

She opened and read it, her face getting more still and stony as she read. Miss Oldcastle stood and looked at her mother with cheeks now pale but with still flashing eyes. The moment her mother had finished the letter, she walked swiftly to the fire, tearing the letter as she went, and thrust it between the bars, pushing it in fiercely with the poker, and muttering—

"A vile forgery of those low Chartist wretches! As if he would ever have looked at one of their women! A low conspiracy to get money from a gentleman in his honourable position!"

And for the first time since she went to the place, Jane said, there was colour in that dead white face.

She turned once more, fiercer than ever, upon Jane, and in a tone of rage under powerful repression, began,—

"You leave the house—this instant."

The last two words, notwithstanding her self-command, rose to a scream. And she came from the fire towards Jane, who stood trembling near the door, with such an expression on her countenance that absolute fear drove her from the room before she knew what she was about. The locking of the door behind her let her know that she had abandoned her young mistress to the madness of her mother's evil temper and disposition. But it was too late. She lingered by the door and listened, but beyond an occasional hoarse tone of suppressed energy, she heard nothing. At length the lock as suddenly turned, and she was surprised by Mrs. Oldcastle, if not in a listening attitude, at least where she had no right to be after the dismissal she had received.

Opposite Miss Oldcastle's bedroom was another, seldom used, the door of which was now standing open. Instead of speaking to Jane, Mrs. Oldcastle gave her a violent push, which drove her into this room. Thereupon she shut the door and locked it. Jane spent the whole of the night in that room, in no small degree of trepidation as to what might happen next. But she heard no noise all the rest of the night, part of which, however, was spent in sound sleep, for Jane's conscience was in no ways disturbed as to any part she had played in the current events.

It was not till the morning that she examined the door, to see if she could not manage to get out and escape from the house, for she shared with the rest of the family an indescribable fear of Mrs. Oldcastle and her confidante, the White Wolf. But she found it was of no use: the lock was at least as strong as the door. Being a sensible girl and self-possessed, as her parents' child ought to be, she made no noise, but waited patiently for what might come. At length, hearing a step in the passage, she tapped gently at the door and called, "Who's there?" The cook's voice answered.

"Let me out," said Jane. "The door's locked."

The cook tried, but found there was no key. Jane told her how she came there, and the cook promised to get her out as soon as she could. Meantime all she could do for her was to hand her a loaf of bread on a stick from the next window. It had been long dark before some one unlocked the door, and left her at liberty to go where she pleased.

Unable to find her young mistress, Jane packed her box, and, leaving it behind her, escaped to her father. As soon as she had told him the story, he came straight to me.

A MORNING MEDITATION.

Along the way, this coming day,
Your feet and mine must tread the road;
And still press on, thro' storm and sun,
Till we can rest in God's abode.

The daily care will everywhere
Gloom down and darken on the mind;
But as we go, now fast now slow,
Each step will leave it more behind.

Around us still, by vale or hill,
Our Foe his traps and snares will set;
But when our eyes dread no surprise,
Our Friend our feet will rescue yet.

And for the day shall be a stay,
On which our souls may rest their need;
And even where the lands are bare,
A Table shall be spread to feed.

And for the night shall be a Light,
To shine our devious steps about;
Bright'ning from far, like ev'ning star,
Which wildest winds can ne'er blow out.

And then at last, when all is past,
Heaven's glory will begin to rise;
A happy Land, where God's kind hand,
Will wipe the tears from all the eyes.

Along the way, this coming day,
Your feet and mine must tread the road;
And still press on, thro' storm and sun,
Till we may rest in God's abode.

THE PRESENCE OF CHRIST.

God for us, God with us, God in us—here are the ideas which describe our religion. For they explain its motive, they declare its meaning, they define its doctrine. The motive is, that God being for us, all things shall work together for our good, if we are for Him. The meaning is, that God being with us, a Divine Providence is ever ready to lead us on "by the right way." The doctrine is, that an Indwelling God is our salvation.

Adolphe Monod, detecting a historical relation between these ideas of God's favour, God's presence, and God's indwelling, has localised the first in the Old Testament, the second in the Gospels, the third in the Epistles. In the Old Testament we see God both on our side, and also with us, yet with us but occasionally, and in the form of angels: and we find nothing of what may be called the foundation truth of St. Paul's system, the union of the human soul with the Spirit of God. In the Gospels God speaks to us by his Son. Since Christ went away, we have had the promise of the Comforter. "He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you."

Like blazing torches gleaming at long intervals over a wide and dark plain, the various manifestations of Jehovah in the interval from the Fall to the Incarnation kept fresh in men's hearts the truth of a Living God. What, indeed, was the precise nature of the intercourse between Adam and his Maker before sin made him hide himself "from the presence of the Lord in the trees of the garden" it is easier to speculate than ascertain. He heard a voice, but did he see a similitude? When he fled, was it from a face, on which he had been wont to look, or from a Holiness, which he had learned to fear? How, further, God told Noah to make the ark, or bade Abram leave his father's house, or spoke with Moses by the burning bush, Scripture does not explain. Sometimes we read of visions, as when Abram sat in his tent-door in the heat of the day; or of dreams, as when God showed to Nebuchadnezzar what He was about to do to him, or of similitudes, as when Moses and Aaron "saw the God of Israel, and there was under his feet, as it were, a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of Heaven in his clearness." When Israel came out of Egypt the cloud by day and the flame by night were the visible guarantees of the Divine promise—"My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest." The one promise by which God ever strengthened the hearts of his servants, whether patriarchs, or prophets, or kings, was the distinct assurance of his Divine presence, saying to Isaac, "I will be with thee," and to Jacob, "Behold, I am with thee," and to Moses, "Certainly I will be with thee," and to Jeremiah, "I am with thee to deliver thee." While of Hezekiah it was written, "The Lord was with him," and it was David's joyful boast, "When I awake, I am still with Thee."

When Christ came, for a brief interval which cut the world's life into two distinct halves, God was "manifest in the flesh." Surely it is most instructive to observe how, by his words before his Resurrection, and his acts after it, He prepared the Church for his protracted absence. The outward symbols of bread and wine, in the solemnly instituted sacrament of the Lord's Supper, while they conveyed to faithful partakers the blessed sustenance of his spiritual body and blood, were also to enable his followers to realise, when they willed it, the fact of his presence in their hearts. Of all his many hard words to them, none were so hard as those in which He strove to assure them that his going away would be for their gain, no explanation so disappointing as that by which He maintained it. He was going away, but He was coming back. The world should not see Him, but they should see Him, and their joy should abide. It was not, however, to be a mere sight of the senses, as it was then, but the beholding of Him by faith in the power of the Spirit. His coming back to be with them was not so much his return to the world for forty short and disappointing days, but his coming with his Father to those who loved his words to take up an abode in their hearts. "Abide in me, and I in you." Henceforward the life of the Church was to be his ever present absence. Those manifold and abrupt appearances and disappearances after the Resurrection were not merely to show by many infallible proofs, that He was risen from the dead, but by a process of kind weaning to prepare them for the time when He would have ascended into his glory. He would teach them that He was always at hand, though they did not see Him, always thinking of them and watching over them, though He might seem to be far away; absent in the body He was present in the spirit, and in the fulness of his Divine power, He would not leave them orphans, He would come to them. The vision of the glorified Saviour at the right hand of God nerved Stephen to die. To St. Paul at Corinth, set in the midst of great dangers, the Lord spake in a vision: "Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace, for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee." The tradition of Paradise is also the hope of glory. Interrupted by the Fall, and restored by the Cross, it will be perfected in the Resurrection. The Revelation, which in the beginning tells us how the beloved Apostle in Patmos fell down as dead before the excellent glory of Jesus, in the end assures us, that in the new Jerusalem "they shall see his face, and his name shall be in their foreheads." We shall not fear Him then, for "perfect love casteth out fear:" and his presence will not only be a spiritual nearness to soiled and earthly hearts little capable of it, little thankful for it, but the unveiled face of the Lamb, which is in the midst of the Throne.

To ascertain precisely what we are to understand by this "Presence of Christ," we must separate it from a truth with which it may easily be confounded, and distinguish it from the doctrine in which it is virtually contained.

It is not, for instance, a mere physical nearness, identical with the truth of the Divine omnipresence (which, expressed more accurately, is rather the presence of all things before God, than God present to all things). For that truth may be as much a thought of terror as of consolation, and equally affects inanimate with animate things, irrational with rational, bad men with good men, hell with heaven. And though God cannot dwell in our hearts without blessing us with his presence, though to have Him in us must be to have Him with us, and so all that we actually need for our provision and safety is infallibly ensured for those who trust in Him; the sun behind the clouds can never be the same quickening and fertilising power on the chilled and wet earth, as when shining out in its strength; we ask for the light of God's countenance to give us peace; and even Jesus when his Father hid Himself found it heavier than He could bear,—to be forsaken was harder than to die. The Divine Presence symbolised under the rod and staff of the Good Shepherd means the sense of Christ's sympathy, and the assurance of Christ's aid.

Sympathy, let us observe, is more than love, being love perfected by experience. It is impossible to sympathise with what we do not fully understand, and some things can be understood only by the actual endurance of them. We must ourselves have been ill quite to sympathise with the sick; the rich may be kind to the poor; but to know what it is to want daily bread, our own shelf must have been empty. When we seek comfort, do not we naturally go to those whose actual wounds have shed the same kind of blood as ours? Our little children love us, and when death has robbed us of the best treasure of our home, it comforts us that we still have them to love, we feel as we take them on our knee, we are not bankrupts yet. But a great gulf separates us from them; they are sorry for us, they try to understand our sadness, they look into our face, and kiss us more tenderly than ever, they mean to be good, just to make us happy. But they cannot understand what we have lost, and we do not attempt to explain it; neither do we complain that their tears are too soon dried, or that in a few days they are as merry as ever. The loud laughter ringing down the nursery-stairs, the wooden horse running swiftly over the floor, somehow, after the first jar do not really disturb us. We are not so unjust as to think them unfeeling because they are not like ourselves; yet the end of it is, we mourn alone. Christ's sympathy is the fellow feeling of one who, loving us to begin with, and so disposed to pity us, understands what we suffer, for He has suffered it himself, nay, suffers it all with us, for his life and our life are one. "I am the Vine, ye are the branches." When the vine is pruned, and the sap runs out, a living pain shudders through the entire tree. "In all our affliction He is afflicted, and the angel of his presence saves us." O, who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Nothing, indeed, outside of us can do it. Satan has no power over us but what we are pleased to give him. Why should Christ rob himself of his purchased possession? How can He change, or tire, or forget us, who is the "same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever?" If we lose this blessed sympathy, it is because we ourselves throw it away. No hand can cut us off from Christ but our own.

Yet He is God as well as man, and the comfort of his presence consists mainly in this, that He is able as well as willing to save. How often have we to confess, sadly, if not bitterly, the helplessness of mere sympathy. It is useless to inquire, when the end is just the same, which is the more mortifying, will without power, or power without will. But our Master, Christ, has both. St. Paul had learned not only his Lord's tenderness, but also his strength. "Most gladly, therefore, will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, for when I am weak, then am I strong." Let us learn with the apostle that the presence of Christ means the sympathy of a kind friend, and the help of a strong one; the right arm and right hand of one who, rejoicing with us when we rejoice, and weeping with us when we weep, can cover our head in the day of battle. When pain is sharp, when illness is tedious, when hopes are disappointed, when temptation is strong, when "the enemy comes in like a flood," and we cry out "all these things are against me," then let our question be, "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" Then let our consolation be, "In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily."

For though He is not now on earth to tell us, face to face, of his love, He comes to us, He speaks with us through his Spirit. "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us." It is the Spirit's work to glorify Jesus. "He shall receive of mine, and show it unto you." It is our privilege to receive the Spirit, and we are bidden to be filled with Him; and who shall say, what light and joy, what liberty and holiness, what power and usefulness might be ours, if we would but believe. Yet this is just what we will not do. Christ's sympathy seems much less real, and much farther off than man's; and Christ's power, which is possible enough when we read of it in an inspired book, seems impossible when we try to apply it to our present difficulties, and our hearts are so full of earthly cares and earthly possessions, that once more it is true, "There is no room for him in the inn." Oh, our inconsistency and insincerity! Oh! the deliberateness with which we deceive ourselves! Oh the resoluteness with which we set ourselves to the utterly impossible task of following Christ without taking up the cross! If we could but make up our mind to decide on one or the other, and to be honest about it; either to choose Christ and to be altogether Christians, or to choose Mammon, and to be altogether for this world, there would be gain each way, and no one would be disappointed or deceived. But now Christ loses, the Church loses, the world loses; and, as to ourselves, even if at last we are saved, as through the fire, what a loss of peace now, and of glory to come!

Christ's presence is always blessed, for the still moments and for the noisy moments, when we are at work and when we are at rest, when we mourn and when we sing. "Abide with us for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent," is ever the devout utterance of all true hearts to Him; when is there a moment, when we can afford to lose Him, or that He can be an intrusive guest?

Yet there are times when we specially need Him, and when, therefore, He specially offers himself. How much we read in the Bible about fear, and how continually we are there warned against it. For though fear, like anger, is an original element of our nature, and "the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom," there is much fear that dishonours God and debases and enfeebles men. The greatest of the saints have had their moments of fear. Abram feared, when he went down into Egypt; Moses, when God sent him to Pharaoh; Elijah, when he fled from Jezebel. One of the grandest passages in the Old Testament is the Divine expostulation with Israel: "I, even I, am He that comforteth you: who art thou that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the Son of Man which shall be made as grass, and forgettest the Lord thy Maker?" One of the most blessed promises in the Old Testament is in the book of the same prophet: "Fear not, for I have redeemed thee; I have called thee by thy name, thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."

Perhaps the most common, and human, and reasonable of all kinds of fear is the fear of death. Yet even here, as the Psalmist tells us, the Divine Presence is sufficient. "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil: for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

The expression, "shadow of death," occurs eleven times in Scripture, viz., five times in Job, four times in the Psalms, once in Jeremiah, once in Amos; and we are yet more familiar with the image through its introduction into the "Pilgrim's Progress," where Christian after his victory over Apollyon, and long before he reaches the Celestial City, passes through the valley with terrible conflict, and is joined by Faithful soon after he comes out. I have called the fear of death reasonable, and it is surely fair to say so, if love of life is a Divinely ordered law for us, and if but for that fear men would rush much oftener than they do into its mysterious darkness with all their sins on their head. The great bulk of men, indeed, whom youth and vigour seem to separate from it by an almost infinite interval, seldom think of it, will not look at it; and what we steadily ignore can hardly cause us acute alarm. Besides, it is hard really to face it until it faces us. Human nature will not needlessly, cannot easily, by mere force of fancy, or in the gratuitous indulgence of a morbid whim, lay itself down with Charles V. within the narrow walls of a tomb, to dramatise its dissolution. Only, when sentence of death is pronounced, and we feel that there is no postponing it, do we rouse ourselves in earnest to think what it must really be. And then, let us confess, it is a dark valley that opens out before us, and many ghastly shadows are flitting through it; it is a real enemy, and it must be conquered; it is something more than the mere fluttering of the wing of the impatient spirit, it is somewhat harder than the unconscious dropping of the garment of our mortality; we will not overrate it, but we will not despise it; and if in a few rare natures there be the sublime spectacle of triumph in death; if some, through the exceeding vividness of their faith, and the ardour of their hope, and the intenseness of their love long for it, and welcome it, it will be safer for most of us to wait quietly till it comes, knowing who bids it come, neither shrinking from it in unmanly terror, nor rushing to meet it in hysteric joy. Sometimes the bitterness of death is passed long before we die; Hopeful, as he forded the river, could think of nothing but the glorious land beyond; and if there are more "Christians" than "Hopefuls," "when the shore is won at last, who will count the billows passed?" "Thou art with me:" this is all we care for; it is the presence of Christ that robs death of its sting.

We shall see this more clearly if, first, we briefly inquire what there is to fear in death, and then consider how the Saviour's presence chases that fear away.

Death means loss, solitude, and retribution. Certainly it is loss, loss of all we know and possess, and enjoy, and love. It is loss of the blue sky, and the sweet flowers, and the rolling sea, and the purple hills; it is loss of home with its living treasures, of life with its stirring activities, of science with its secrets, and art with its skill; it is loss of the joy of travel, of the rapture of music, of the society of books; it is loss of the fireside of winter, of the sweet freshness of the summer morning, of the ripeness of autumn, of the greenness of spring. And then (unless the hurrying away be more premature still) just when the enjoyment of these things is deepening, and our possessions are accumulating, as the dreams of youth solidify into the occupations of manhood, as the heat and burden of the day give place in their turn to the repose and memories of age; when the tide of life is at its full, when the pinnacle is reached, the prize won, the fortune made, the children reared; when our mistakes are forgotten, and our errors condoned, when neighbours esteem us, and strangers respect us; when we have learned (after innumerable failures) in some slight degree how to conquer self, how to use money, how to do good without doing harm, how to choose the right way without first going the wrong; at the moment when we are most capable of making others happy by our kindness, and good by our example, and wise by our experience. The enemy who has been waiting for us ever since we were born, and who was content to wait, knowing that we could not escape him, comes to fetch us away; and we must go. "Behold, thou hast made my days as an handbreadth: and mine eye is as nothing before thee; verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity."

Death is also solitude. "Je mourrai seul." Of course all sorrow is solitary. For though the outward facts and features of our sorrow be identical with those of other men's, and produce some effects which are common to the race, one man's moral nature is so different to another man's, and the shafts which pierce us are so variously aimed, so differently weighted, that each of us, besides what he endures in common with his fellows, has his own pain, which no one else can suffer quite in the same way.

But in death there is a solitude, which exists in no other kind of sorrow, for we only die once; and not one of the friends, who stand by watching us, can know, from personal experience, what dying means. Possibly they have been very near it. They may have stood on the edge of the dark river, and its cold waves may have washed over their feet; they may have taken their last farewells, and set their house in order, and looked right into the Eternal world. But they did not die, and to expect death is not the same thing as to endure it. For the first time, perhaps, in all our lives we are starting on a journey which we must travel alone; and those who most wish to be with us, and whom we, too, most wish for, must stay behind, while we go on. They can bless us, they can tell us of their sweet and passionate and undying love; they can pray, and the last sound we hear is the name of Him who is the Resurrection and the Life; but the end of it is that we go, and they stay, and never is human love felt to be more utterly impotent than when it watches an ebbing life.

And death means retribution. "For God shall bring every work into judgment, whether it be good, or whether it be evil." It is quite true that conscience does not always wake up before death, and Lord Bacon has observed that there is not a single quality in our moral nature, which has not at some time or other mastered the fear to die. But it is also true, that in a great multitude of instances conscience at such times does make cowards of us; and when it is too late to do what we ought to have done, and to repent of what we ought not to have done, prayer is but the spasm of a panic,—we fear hell, not God. And yet, not only to the unforgiven and impenitent soul, drifting helplessly on towards its final doom, is the thought of death a thing of sadness; it is often, oh! often, both a humiliation and a bitterness to the soul, which long before had cast its sins on Christ, and found rest and peace through his blood. Life come to an end, and so little done in it! Sin still so strong, the world still so powerful, self still so dominant, prayer still so hard! We recall past opportunities, and feel how sinfully we have neglected them; this soul and that soul have come in our way, and we did not even try to do them good. How much money we have wasted on vanity: how little we have denied ourselves to spare for Christ or his kingdom. Talking, listening, planning, beginning! Oh! of that there has been an abundance; but what will there be to show Christ when He returns, of actual finished work, that will stand the fire?

Yet even in death "this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." "Thou art with me," said David, and we have yet the more sure word of the New Testament. "Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them, who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage."

For if death is loss, Christ can make up for it ten thousand fold. Is our earthly life ended? He gives us a long life, even for ever and ever. Does death sever us from those we love on earth? Christ unites us to those we love in heaven. He takes us from sin to sinlessness, from perfect weakness to perfect strength, from restlessness to rest, from faith to sight, from men to angels, from cold prayers to the song that ceases not day nor night, from a world lying in wickedness to the just made perfect in sight of the Throne. If Christ cannot, or will not do all this for us, then He is nothing to us, and why do we believe on Him? If He can, and will, "to die is gain."

As to solitude, who knows so much of solitude in life as the Man of Sorrows? Who has tasted so bitterly of solitude in death as He who said of himself by the Prophet, "I have trodden the wine-press alone"? His life was eminently one long solitude in its condition and nature, in its aims and purposes, in its hopes and fears. Not only by his enemies, but by his disciples, not only by his disciples, but by his brethren, not only by his brethren, but by his mother, was He hindered, and disappointed, and misunderstood. Prayer was the only real interruption of his loneliness; and when He died, there was but one Apostle to stand by his cross.

Oh, the solitude of death is filled with Jesus! He knows it all, for He has tasted it all. He who has died that He might save us, is with us, when He has saved us to sustain us in the dizziness of our fainting consciousness, and to lull us with a brother's tenderness into our sleep in Him.

For once more we are sinners, and to complete the assurance of our faith, He who is our dearest, kindest, strongest friend in the world is also our born Saviour. He has saved us from the guilt of sin, and from the power of sin, and from the punishment of sin. "He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with his stripes we are healed." And so if Satan comes (as he often does come) at our last hour to accuse us bitterly in the court of our own conscience, to cast doubts on our pardon, to wound us with bitter recollections of past shortcomings, and to lash us into the sin of despair, at such moments let the tempted soul instantly cast itself on Jesus to hide in Him, to cling to Him; let it bid the tempter go to Him, our surety and representative, who long ago made himself responsible for us, when we made our great exchange, of laying on Him our debts, and taking from Him his righteousness. The one name we utter shall be Jesus, the one answer that we make shall be Jesus, the one plea we urge shall be Jesus. We know that we have no suffering of our own to offer as an atonement; but this we also know that—Christ has died. We are quite aware that we have no righteousness of our own to prefer, as our claim for heaven; but if any one asks how we expect to get there, we take the question to Him who has called himself "the Way, the Truth, and the Life," and the answer comes back in a flood of peace, which "none but his loved ones know." Nay, if for a moment we are in darkness, and have no light: if we know not how to deny the suggestion that our iniquities have separated between us and our God; and that the barrier between us is of our own making—well, we are saved, not by joy, but by faith. If we must perish, we will perish clasping the cross, and clinging to the Saviour, quite sure that He will not suffer the very least of his elect through any pains of death to fall from Him.

As a matter of experience there is no rule to measure this fear of death, and no principle to determine it; often there is none of it, where it might be most looked for, sometimes it is very terrible where we should have thought it could not come. In some cases the cause is entirely physical, either seated in the constitution, or closely connected with disease; and not unfrequently those who in the distance have most dreaded it, and on the brightness of whose life it has ever projected a cold and dark shadow, when the time has come, much to their own surprise, have found it but falling asleep. It does, however, sometimes happen that even with tried Christians a thick mist envelopes the soul in its declining hours, and though the setting sun before it dips under the horizon bursts out into gold and flame, it has been a sore struggle, and for long it seemed in vain to pray. Now there are at least two purposes which we may reverently suppose God desires to accomplish by a trial of this kind. One is the conversion or edification of those who stand by; the other is the final perfecting of those who suffer. It is a story often told of an eminent servant of God, who had during his life-time frequently prayed that his happy death might be blessed to an ungodly son, that when his time came, fear and sadness overwhelmed him; not so much the thought of Christ's salvation possessed him, as the fact of his own sinfulness; the joy of heaven faded before his utter unworthiness of admission there. Yet God, who was wiser than he, answered his prayer in a way that he knew not. "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." The careless son, who might not have been affected by his father's happiness, was deeply moved by his father's fear, "If a man like him, after a useful and religious life, fears to die, what is death likely to be to me? Surely except I repent I shall perish." Now, for such an end, who would not welcome such a sorrow? There is yet another reason why it may seem good to God in the last hours of our life to hide his face for a little moment. We may have been leaning too much on outward helps, or on past experience, or on systems of doctrine, and we have not come quite close to God himself to cleave with all our strength to Him. Therefore He must teach us, and through us others, that orthodox opinions cannot give us peace; that sermons, and sacraments, and ordinances, cannot give us peace; that pious parents, faithful pastors, exemplary friends cannot give us peace; that belonging to this sect, or pronouncing this shibboleth, or confessing this creed, or observing this ritual, cannot give us peace; that the esteem and commendation of our neighbours cannot give us peace;—in a word, that all covering of our own must be torn into shreds that all unsound hopes must be utterly disappointed that every shelter but the shelter of the Saviour's cross must be swept away before the winds of heaven, that every other name as a way of salvation must be as sounding brass, or tinkling cymbal, save Jesus, Son of God. Sooner or later all this must come to us; it is better if it comes before, but better then than never; and dark as the declining hour may be, severe as the actual crisis may be, it comes to an end at last. The fight is won, the cross is clasped, the light comes, the joy comes, for the Saviour comes; and He who only waited to be more gracious, who hid himself only to shine out more glorious at last, who denied, that in the end He might be more bountiful, who seemed to frown, only because He purposed to smile, comes and whispers, "Thy sins be forgiven thee, go in peace;" and the rough water is passed, the ship glides into harbour, "and the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass that they escaped all safe to land."

Does the thought cross any one who reads this paper, "How shall I myself die?" Well, it is something worth thinking about. Of course we all wish to die happily. There are many Balaams, if there are few Pauls. Yet it is something worse than folly to forget that death hangs on life, to make death the crisis and life the trifle; whereas death merely pronounces the verdict, life settles it: it is solemn to die, only because it is awful to live. What we all of us need to learn more is how to walk with God hour by hour as a man with his friend; not so much to be continually going in and out of his presence as to be always living in it, without effort thinking of Him, without insincerity consulting Him, without hesitation obeying Him, without embarrassment speaking of Him. Instead of endeavouring, in the happy simplicity of an almost unconscious religion, to set Christ before us in all we do, to have Him with us wherever we go, to make joy safe by asking Him to share it, to rob care of its carefulness by casting it as it comes all on Him, we are too apt to separate prayer from life, heaven from earth, holiness from happiness, as if human affections lowered divine aspirations, as if we could be more like God by being less like men. Thus when we go to meet Him we have formally to prepare ourselves for solemn audience. It is almost as if we had to unclothe ourselves of the earthly and to clothe ourselves with the heavenly. Reverence! how can we be reverent enough; but surely He prefers the simple trustfulness of kinsfolk to the distant homage of strangers; and if we made it more our endeavour to bring every thought, every word, every habit, every employment, every recreation, every commonest act of life into captivity to Christ, and so into harmony and fellowship with Him, it would not violently interrupt us, as it often does, to lay down the task of the moment, to hold intercourse with Him.

There are three chief conditions of abiding in Christ's presence—obedience, meditation, and love. We must obey Him. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." How is it possible, I will not say to desire, but even to endure the thought of Christ's company, if we are wilfully wandering from Him, or resisting Him, loving what He hates, or doing what He forbids? It is a question how many there are of his own true people who if told, as one of old was told, "The Master is come, and calleth for thee," would rise to go to Him with a glow of happy surprise. Then there must be more of secret, and continuous, and real thinking of Him. If prayer is the worship of the heart, meditation is that of the mind. Pascal has said, "Thought makes the greatness of men." Why is there so little meditation among Christians—such a lack of that quietness, and stillness, and thoughtfulness of soul and spirit, in which alone the dews fall on us, and the life of Christ grows. There is much activity of hands and feet, much listening, far too much talking. Yet, where the heart is, there the treasure is; and it is in human nature to think of what we love. Once more we shall seek Christ, we shall be with Him, we shall think of Him just in proportion as we love Him. We never find it irksome or dull to be with those we love; we have always something to speak of to them. O, to love Christ better! One true throb of love to Him is worth more in his sight than the thrones of a hundred kings. If we really loved Christ, and trusted Him, we should seek his presence to make life happy as well as death easy; and then, when the summons does come, when the most unutterable, the most momentous of all convictions seizes us—that at length our own life is over, it will be but like going out of one room into another, we shall indeed be more than conquerors through Him that loved us, when his love has been the reality of our life.

"It is appointed unto men once to die, and after that the Judgment." Mr. Alexander Smith, in one of his "Essays in Dreamthorp," has strikingly observed that death gives a kind of dignity to the very meanest and shabbiest of human beings. When we are dead, our enemies cease to envy us, our friends love us better than ever, some admire, all pity. But why will not we go a little further, and, not content with imagining our friends and neighbours in the sublime repose of death, also think of them in the vast spirit land, and standing under the great White Throne? It is in the power of every one of us to make some one fitter to go before the judgment-seat of Christ. "Christianity would sacrifice its divinity if it abandoned its missionary character. When the power of reclaiming the lost dies out of the Church, it ceases to be the Church. Where the power remains, there, whatever is wanting, it may still be said that the tabernacle of God is with men." Yet is there anything so evident or so inexplicable as the paralysis that affects so great a multitude of professing Christians in their intercourse with those who plainly know not God? Is it that we do not believe that souls can be lost, or is it that we do not care? Either there is a hell, or there is not. If there is not, then how do we know that there is a heaven? If there is, and if Jesus died to deliver us from it, and if there is one human being on this earth whom we can influence, praying where we cannot speak, where we can speak praying too, let us do whatever we may with all possible kindness, and wisdom, and humility, and earnestness, to bid men flee from the wrath to come, and to win our Saviour souls.

So, whether for ourselves, or for those we love, we will fear no evil, if only Christ be ours. Death has yet to come; and we do not know in what shape it will come; it may be quite near or it may still be far away.

> "Thou inevitable day,
> When a voice to me shall say
> Thou must rise and come away;
> Art thou distant, art thou near,
> Wilt thou seem more dark or clear,
> Day with more of hope or fear?"

Anyhow, we will not dwell too much on it; instead of looking down into the open grave we will look up for the glorious appearing; we know of a happy country across the dark river; we have heard of the shining ones who will lead us up the hill. It is no new temptation, but one that is common to man. He who has helped others through it will help us through it. Those gone before us, who have got it over found Him near them. He who was faithful to them will be faithful to us, and to those whom we leave behind. Do we sometimes ask in the secret of our own thoughts, which of us will go first? Do what we will, do not sad fears sometimes force themselves on us, as we think of the whitening hair, or the thinned hands, or the pale cheeks, or the tottering footsteps of those we love? Well, they may go first, but the interval between them and us in the balance of eternity is but the single tick of a pendulum; "sorrow endureth but for a night, joy cometh in the morning." The bed of death is the presence chamber of Jesus. We who stand by cannot see with our mortal eyes what is vouchsafed to those who are putting on immortality; but if we cannot know, we may at least believe, and the radiant joy that sometimes lights up the wan countenance of a dying Christian, tells of an Invisible Presence that is shining there. It is a solemn moment as the soul passes away; yet for us only is it a time of sadness. They, if they could speak, would say, "Weep not for me, but sing with me, O death, where is thy sting; O grave, where is thy victory?"

And He who goes with them stays with us. For He is in Paradise with those that sleep in Him. He is on earth with those that wait for Him. He can think of the living as well as of the dying; of those who have still to grapple with the last struggle, as well as of those who sing the conqueror's song. So we pass out of the sight of our dead, wondering at our own calmness; thankfulness for the glorious change passed on them absorbs all selfish thought of the grief come on us; we too feel that if we have lost much we have gained much; earth is beneath us, we have stood on the very threshold of Heaven, and the love of Christ is more real than ever. On the morrow, when we go out of our chamber to do our work, to meet our friends, to feel our loss—He who was with us in the quiet night meets us in the glare of the morning; we remember the promise, "Thy brother shall rise again."

HEROES AND MARTYRS OF THE REFORMATION IN ITALY.

IV.—THE LADIES ISABELLA MANRICHA AND VITTORIA COLONNA.

Next to Giulia da Gonzaga, the most prominent place among the female followers of Juan Valdez is due to the lady Isabella Manricha da Bresagna. Of the history of this devoted lady only a few facts have been preserved; but enough remains to show that she is to be numbered among the most sincere, earnest, and honourable of the adherents of evangelical truth in Italy at the time of the Reformation.

The lady Isabella was probably a Spaniard by descent, if not by birth. To this we are led by her name, which is that of a Spanish family famous in the annals of their country. Among the minor poets of Spain a high place is held by Jorge Manricha, who died in 1485, and whose "Coplas," a series of elegiac odes on the death of his father, Don Federigo, have been much admired, and have received the honour of being edited and translated by Longfellow.* Alfonso Manricha, Archbishop of Seville, is mentioned by Juan Valdez in his Dialogue between Mercury and Charon, where he is celebrated for his moderation and for the success with which he preserved peace amid the agitation which arose in consequence of the writings of Erasmus. It is frequently said that Isabella was his sister; this may have been the case, but the statement lacks authority. In the absence of any decisive information as to her birthplace, it may be allowable to attach some weight to the language of Celio Curione, who, in dedicating to her the first edition of the collected works of Olympia Morata, says that he has so done "in order that she whom Italy produced, and to whom Germany supplied a grave, might in some sense be restored to her own Italy."* This language would seem to imply that Isabella Manricha, as well as Olympia, belonged by birth to Italy. It may be added that Simler speaks of Italy as the native land (patria) of Isabella.†

Isabella was one of the earliest of the adherents of Valdez, and none more thoroughly embraced the doctrines he taught than she. When the little society was dispersed after his death, she, turning a deaf ear to the earnest solicitations of her relatives, who would have had her renounce the opinions she had embraced, and finding that, as from solicitations they advanced to threats, it was no longer safe for her to remain in Naples, betook herself to Germany. She afterwards removed to Zurich, and ultimately to Chiavenna, in the Valtelline. In this rich, extensive, and populous valley the Protestant doctrines had obtained a firm footing, though in the face of much opposition on the part of the clergy, the monks, and the ignorant populace. Stretching down from the higher part of the Grisons to the Lago di Como, the Valtelline became a place of meeting for Swiss and Italians, and the seeds of Divine truth, which were scattered first among its people by visitors from the north, were watched over, watered, and still more widely diffused by refugees from various parts of Italy. Numerous churches were thus planted in that region; and, though at no time altogether free from the consequences of the bitter hatred and watchful jealousy of the Romanists, they enjoyed, under the sway of the Republic, protection from outward violence; and by the blessing of God upon the labours of their faithful pastors—amongst whom was the learned, acute, and profound Jeronimo Zanchi—many flourishing congregations had been established.

As the people of that district used the Italian language, it was natural that refugees from Italy should betake themselves thither when compelled to forsake their own homes because of their attachment to evangelical truth. To the Valtelline, accordingly, some of the dispersed congregation at Naples fled after the death of Valdez; and among the rest the lady Isabella Manricha. Here she "led a life of poverty and retirement with as much cheerfulness as if she had never known what it was to enjoy affluence and honours."* Renounced by her family, and dependent, apparently, upon the kindness of others for her means of support,† she felt that all she had thus to endure was more than counterbalanced by the privilege she enjoyed of liberty of conscience and of hearing God's truth preached in its purity and simplicity. The respect in which she was held by her fellow-Protestants may be inferred from the fact (already mentioned) that Curione dedicated to her the first edition of the collected works of Olympia Morata (the second being dedicated to Queen Elizabeth of England), and the fact that Ochino dedicated his treatise on the Sacrament to her.

In 1551 the hostility of the opponents of the Reformation broke out in violent measures against those who, under the protection of the government of the Grisons, were openly professing attachment to it, and enjoying the privileges its advocates asserted. Roused by the efforts of the priests, and excited by fanatical harangues from a body of monks sent by the Bishop of Como with that intention, the populace demanded of the government that the law allowing the Italian refugees to settle in the Valtelline should be repealed. This demand, refused by the diet, was conceded by the local governor through dread of a popular insurrection. The consequence was that the preachers were silenced, and that several persons of rank, who had taken refuge there, made preparations to remove to Switzerland; among whom was the lady Isabella Manricha. It was not found necessary, however, to carry this design into execution. The Diet, indignant at what had taken place, renewed the edict granting liberty of conscience and worship to the exiles, and charged the authorities of the Valtelline to see it faithfully observed. How long Isabella remained at Chiavenna after this, or whether she ever left it, remains uncertain. The only subsequent notice of her we possess informs us that in June, 1559, she was still there, but uncertain whether to continue or to remove elsewhere. After this the shadows close over her; and we can trace her career no farther. There is every reason to believe, however, that she remained faithful to the last to the principles she had so long professed, and for her devotion to which she had suffered so much.

Less decided in her attachment to the party of the Reformers, but not, we believe, less imbued with evangelical beliefs and feelings, was another of the female attendants on the teaching of Juan Valdez at Naples, Vittoria Colonna, Marchioness of Pescara. She was the daughter of Fabricio, Grand Constable of the Kingdom of Naples and of Anna di Montefeltro, sister of Federigo, Duke of Urbino. Her birth took place about the year 1490, at Marino, a fief of her family. At the early age of four years she was affianced to Ferdinando, or Ferrante d'Avalos, Marquis of Pescara, a child a year or two her senior. When she had reached the age of seventeen they were married. The union was one of mutual affection, and proved a source of much happiness to both parties; but it was not destined to be of uninterrupted enjoyment or of long duration. Pescara was a soldier, and one who, like the war-horse of Job, smelled the battle from afar, and had joy in the thunder of the captains and the shouting; and, as the times were times of prevailing conflict, he was not suffered long to rest without provocation to join in the strife. The first few years of his married life were spent with his youthful and accomplished bride on the beautiful island of Ischia, which, in one of her sonnets, she celebrates as the home of > "Beauty chaste, of worth and courtesy

> As great as earth hath seen or heaven bestowed," and as a place to which

> "Both wind and wave give honour, and whose air > Tempers the warm and cold."*

To the happy years she spent here with her husband, immediately after their marriage, she often reverted with mournful interest in future years, as well as to the lonely hours through which she lingered there when his duties on the field summoned him to the risks and sufferings of warfare. The first occasion of his thus leaving her was when he accompanied her father to join the troops mustered to meet the inroad made by Gaston de Foix on the Papal States. The two armies met before the town of Ravenna, and a great battle was fought, in which the French were victorious, though with the loss of their chivalric leader.† In this battle both Colonna and Pescara were taken prisoners, the latter being severely wounded. He was carried to Milan, where he solaced his hours of suffering and captivity by writing dialogues on love to his wife. She, on her side, called the Muses to her aid, and gave utterance to her anxieties and griefs in varied verse. His liberation was at length effected on the payment of a large ransom, and for a brief season he was restored to the felicities of home. But the time was not one of peace, and ere long he was again in the field, and his wife had to console herself, as best she could, for his absence, by the pursuits of literature and the charms of her beautiful retreat. Plaintively she complains, that while she cried for peace others shouted war, and whilst she would have been satisfied only to have had her husband with her in quiet, honour and duty stimulated him to embark in dangerous adventures. After this they met only at short intervals; and at last the intelligence came to her that he was dying. Enfeebled by wounds which he had treated with too much indifference, and worn out by anxiety and arduous exertion, his strength gave way; and, finding himself sinking, he sent for his wife, hoping that her presence would act on him as a restorative. She instantly obeyed the summons, and set out for Milan, where he then was; but she had only reached Viterbo when she was met by news of his death. For several days she gave herself up to the agony of her grief, reading over incessantly the account of his last hours, and giving vent to her emotions in moans and tears. After the first burst of her sorrow had somewhat subsided, she repaired to Naples, where his body was to be buried; there she remained till the last rites were paid, and then she hastened to bury herself in the solitude of her beloved Ischia. For seven years she lived in this retirement, battling with her grief and seeking solace in the utterance of her feelings in verse. To all the suggestions of her friends, who would have had her form another connection with some one of those whom her beauty and accomplishments had attracted, she had but one reply—that her sun ("il mio sole," as she always styles her husband in her poems) was still near her, and that she still felt the bond that united them as strong as when it was first knit.

> "Time cannot change the ancient plighted troth:
> Firm is the knot as when it first was tied,
> Nor comes the deep cause to my heart less dear
> For all the bitter fruit I now must gather."*

She had a melancholy satisfaction in visiting every spot which was associated with recollections of his presence, and "where he had made brighter to her the day." As she watched the sun rising over her "dear rock," as she calls Ischia, she cheered herself with the thought that her own fair sun was shining in heaven; the hope of rejoining him, "her other true soul," made her often long for death; and she would fancy herself happy with him in heaven, assured that he had already "ascended to God." In all this there is the manifestation of a deep and pure affection, and there can be no doubt that to a certain extent Vittoria found solace for her grief in the outpouring of her soul in verse. As yet, however, she was a stranger to the only true and abiding source of consolation for the bereaved. With a mind highly cultivated, with pure and warm affections, and with a large measure of natural religiousness, she had not yet been brought to know God as her Father in heaven, who, rich in love, not only designs affliction, when He permits it to come upon his children for their good, but is able and ready to give them such abundant support under the affliction that they shall be brought even "to glory in tribulations also."* As yet she had not been brought under the elevating and sanctifying power of Gospel truth, and thus had as yet to learn that deep lesson of the Divine love which this alone can teach. And so she had her seven long years of unabated sorrow; the shadows seeming ever to become denser as time rolled on, deep calling unto deep, and the clouds returning after the rain.

But the time at length arrived when the mourner was to be consoled; when she who had been thus "afflicted, tossed with tempest and not comforted," was to find a peace which the world cannot give, and which it cannot take away. How far she was indebted for this to the instructions of Valdez it is not possible to say. But we know that she was among his auditors; and as he seems to have been peculiarly skilful in bringing the Gospel to bear for comfort and direction on bruised and afflicted souls, it is more than probable that it was to him, as the instrument, that Vittoria Colonna was indebted for her introduction into that higher state of spiritual life in which she henceforward walked. Certain it is that the change on her religious state synchronizes with her introduction to the circle of the Reformers at Naples.

From this time forward her poetry breathes the sentiments of a heart that has found rest in God, and is content to wait his will. She confesses how the blind love of the world, and a desire for fame, had secretly influenced her soul, and been nursed by her like a snake in her bosom, and declares that only lament and languishing were her portion until her soul turned to the Lord, from whom the remedy came. She speaks of the delights (dolcezze) that distil from the living Fount divine into the softened heart; intimates that, knowing these, she ceases to wonder that the wisest men, transported with love (ebbri d'amore), should have retired with their cross to mountain wilds, and found life in what the rest of the world, deceived by shadows, would count death; and then she exclaims:—

> "When the soul, quickened, is to God restored,
> And humbly to his will, its will submits,
> Then outward war to it is secret peace."

In one of her sonnets she strikingly ascribes true spiritual enlightenment to the reading of the sacred Scriptures, and meditation on the sacrificial work of the Redeemer.

> "Two ways we have by which to reach the height
> Of heaven's high grace: the one is to explore
> The sacred writings, from whose blessed lore
> Shines to the quickened eye the purest light;
> The other is to raise the inward sight
> Up to the cross, and there, with reverend look,
> Peruse Himself, revealed as in a book,
> So near, so sure, all doubt is put to flight."

As illustrative of the state of mind in which Vittoria now rested and rejoiced, it may be well to give a translation of one or two of her sonnets entire :—

"Eternal God, what peace of mind has he,
What light, what love, what joy of various kind,
Whose heart, to sin and self no more inclined,
With full desire is turned again to Thee ?
Now is he given thy purer flame to see,
And, held by ties that more securely bind
In thy restraint, his liberty can find,
And bitterest death a crown of life to be.
Thus inward teaching makes his faith alive
Knowledge from faith and hope from knowledge spring,
And genuine hope begets new fires again.
Till the rebellious thoughts no longer strive
Against the soul, but both together wing
Their flight, and mortal cares loathe and disdain."

"Thanks to thy sovereign grace, O God ! if I
Am graft in that true Vine a living shoot,
Whose arms embrace the world, and in whose root,
Planted by faith, our life must hidden lie.
But Thou beholdest how I fade and dry,
Choked with a waste of leaf and void of fruit,
Unless thy spring perennial shall recruit
My sapless branch, still waiting fresh supply.
O, cleanse me, then, and make me to abide Wholly in Thee, to drink thy heavenly dew,
And watered daily with my tears to grow.
Thou art the Truth, thy promise is my guide ;
Prepare me when Thou comest, Lord, to show
Fruits answering to the stock on which I grow."*

"As hungry nestling, when her beating wings
Announce his mother, and he sees her nigh,
Bringing him food, welcomes with joyous cry
And fond delight both her and what she brings ;
And, to the nest confined, struggles and springs
With keen desire to follow as she flies ;
And with his chirping thanks her in such wise
As if he fain would answer as she sings,—

"So when to me the warm and vital ray
Of that celestial Sun that warms my heart
With more than wonted lustre on me shines,
I move my wing, owning within love's sway ;
And, though my knowledge is but yet in part,
I make His praise the subject of my lines."

After the death of Valdez, Vittoria Colonna seems to have held but partial intercourse with the avowed Reformers. For a season she was much in the society of Ochino, and doubtless received from his instructions no small spiritual light. But when he openly revolted from the Romish Church, Vittoria drew back and even broke off all communication with him. Those with whom she now consorted may be described as belonging to the Evangelical party within the Church of Rome. Her most intimate friend and adviser was Cardinal Contarini, a man of many virtues, and whose religious beliefs had led him far out of the bondage of Romish superstition and error. She lived on terms of intimacy also with "Monsignore d'Inghilterra," as she calls Cardinal Pole, with Carnesecchi, Marc Antonio Flaminio, and others, whose views were more or less of a Lutheran tendency. Pole at this time was so avowedly a Lutheran in his views of justification by faith alone, and kindred doctrines, that Romish writers have found it necessary to apologise for him, on the ground of imperfect study of theology, and have admitted that his conduct occasioned great astonishment and scandal.* De Thou states that his election to the cardinalate was opposed on the ground that he held erroneous sentiments in theology, and says that during his residence at Viterbo he had showed too much favour to the heretics.† As it was at Viterbo that Vittoria Colonna, then resident as a secular person in the convent of Santa Caterina there, came into communication with him, and indeed seems to have submitted to him as her spiritual director, there is no reason to doubt that the opinions which he at this time held were shared by her. It is certain that he and those associated with him were much occupied in the study of Scripture, and had embraced those views of the way of salvation through Christ alone which are there taught. If Pole afterwards "made shipwreck of the faith and of a good conscience," there were others of his associates at Viterbo who remained faithful even unto the death. It is worthy of notice, also, that the nunnery of Santa Caterina at Viterbo was reported as one of the places suspected of heresy.‡

In 1541 a dispute between the Pope and Asconio Colonna, the brother of Vittoria, led to open war between them, the issue of which was the defeat of Colonna, and the ruin for the time of the Colonna family. Vittoria had retired during the conflict to the convent of St. Paolo, at Orvieto. Here she was closely watched, but nothing could be laid to her charge, nor could anything be elicited from her injurious to her brother. "She has shut herself up," writes the governor of Orvieto to Cardinal Farnese, "in the convent of St. Paolo, with two maids, and keeps two servants without to provide what she needs. She lives in those practices of religion which persons of pure and pious minds generally observe."§ On the death of Paul III. her family recovered their possessions, and Asconio returned to enjoy his estates in peace. In this, however, he was disappointed, for he found an enemy in his own son, who sought to dispossess him, and from whom he had to seek safety in flight. He died shortly after at Naples, where he had been cast into prison by the viceroy, Cardinal Pacecco.

Vittoria continued to reside in the convent at Orvieto till her health began to fail. In 1543 she had suffered from a severe attack, apparently of bronchitis, accompanied with spitting of blood, during which the most anxious fears for her life were excited among her friends. Though she surmounted the immediate severity of the attack, her constitution was seriously shaken by it, and the death unexpectedly of a relative in whom she had from his childhood taken a mother's interest, Alfonso Alvarez, Marquis del Vasto, together with vexations to which she was subjected on account of her religious beliefs, at length completely overcame her. Finding her end drawing near, she left the convent of Sta. Anna at Rome, whither she had removed from Orvieto after her illness, and betook herself to the house of her relative, Giulia Colonna, the wife of Giuliano Cesarino, the only relative she had in Rome. Here she died in February, 1547, aged 54 years, and was buried in the common burying-ground of Sta. Anna. No monument marks the place of her sepulture; and one of the noblest, most lovely and gifted of Italy's daughters seems to have been laid in her tomb with no more ceremony than if she had been one of the humblest inmates of the convent. But many noble spirits mourned her loss, and one grand head at least bent itself in deepest sorrow over her coffin. Among her most intimate friends was the great Michael Angelo Buonarotti; to him she had stood in the relation of a spiritual teacher and counsellor; together had they searched the Scriptures, and earnestly conversed on spiritual things; and to her he confesses in one of his poems that he owed "the turning of his life to heaven by the better way."* When he heard of her death he was overwhelmed with grief, and for a season almost beside himself. Hastening to the place where her remains were, he threw himself beside them in a passion of sorrow, and tenderly kissed her hand. Ere long her countrymen awoke to a sense of what they owed to her genius and worth. In an age of poetry, when it was the fashion for ladies of the highest rank to cultivate the Muse, Vittoria Colonna won for herself a foremost place, and alone of the fifty poetesses whose works the historian tells us were published at that time, has left behind her what the world will not let die.† Six editions of her poems appeared during the sixteenth century; and one so late as the year 1840, carefully edited by Visconti, and beautifully got up at the expense of Prince Alessandro Torlonia, attests the place she still holds in the literature of her country.

It has been disputed with some keenness whether Vittoria Colonna can be claimed by the Protestants as belonging to their party. The truth is, that neither Protestants nor Romanists can wholly claim her. She was not a Protestant in the sense of having seceded from the communion of the Church of Rome, but as little was she a Romanist in the sense of being bound by all the doctrines or attached to all the usages of the Church of Rome. In religious belief she was nearer undoubtedly to the Reformers than to their opponents. She was free from superstitious practices; she claimed and used the privilege of studying the Scriptures for herself; she looked to Christ alone for salvation and help; and in the mercy and grace of God alone she trusted for comfort and solace. There can be no doubt that by the Papal party she was on account of this regarded with suspicion, and was closely watched as one in whom "heretical pravity" might be found. The records of the Inquisition themselves attest that she was subjected to the scrutiny of the Holy Office, and Carracciolo expressly declares that it was under suspicion of heresy on account of her intimacy with Ochino that she was examined.* But whether she was Catholic or Protestant is of small moment—let us hail her by the higher title of Christian in its purest sense.

A prayer is still extant which she composed in Latin, probably towards the close of her life, and it is such as any pious Christian might use. We subjoin a translation, and with that conclude this notice:—

"Grant, I pray, O Lord, that with that lowliness of mind which befits my humble condition, and that elevation of soul which thy majesty demands, I may ever adore Thee; may I continually live in that fear which thy justice inspires, in that hope which thy clemency permits. May I submit myself to Thee as all-powerful, leave myself in thy hands as all-wise, and turn unto Thee as all-perfect and good. I beseech Thee, most merciful Father, that thy most vivid fire may purify me; that thy clearest light may illuminate me; and that that purest love of thine may so advance me that, held back by no mortal influence, I may return safe and happy to Thee."

† "Her poems are not inferior to those of the majority of the Petrarchian poets of that age, and to her is due, moreover, the praise of having shown how felicitously the ordinary poetry can be allied to sacred themes. This has been attempted by others, whose piety, however, is more to be commended than their poetry."—Tiraboschi, vii. 1168: Firenze, 1812.

UNFORGIVING AND UNFORGIVEN.

BY THE EDITOR.

Part I.

"Murder will out," is a common saying, whereby people mean that though that crime is one seldom committed in the presence of witnesses, or to be proved otherwise than by circumstantial evidence, God takes special care to bring it to light, and such as commit it to justice. The fact that it has been often revealed in a very remarkable way is known to all. Many cases are on record where the finger of Providence seemed pointed at the murderer, and circumstances turned up which said, as plainly as the prophet Nathan, Thou art the man! Indeed, one can hardly read a trial for murder without meeting something in the evidence so strange, so unlooked-for, so unexpected, and yet so important for the ends of justice, as to impress us with a sense of a presiding Providence, and of there being more than a vulgar superstition in the saying, "Murder will out." Though they had no claims to be classed with the Causes Célèbres, I myself have met with two cases of the kind.

In one case the crime was committed by a wandering gipsy. He had killed his wife, in a lone corrie of the Grampians, counting no doubt that, buried below the winter snows, and bleached by the sun and wind and summer rains, the body, ere it was discovered, would be a withered skeleton—not to be recognised by the mother who bore it. Yet her blood was hardly dry on the heather, nor had the raven ventured from his perch on an old mountain ash, where he sat whetting his beak and croaking over the corpse, when some smugglers, who were seeking to elude the revenue officers by taking the wildest bypaths over the hills, came on the body. Rough men, and not slack, if brought to bay, to make their bludgeons ring on the heads of the excise, they were horrified at the spectacle, and hastened to raise the alarm. Up rose the hue and cry ; and the body being recognised as that of a woman whom some had seen the day before lying on the hill-side in company with a man that others had met pushing on by himself for the low country, he became an object of suspicion, and also of an active pursuit. They traced him for miles down into Strathmore, and to a village inn where he had spent the night. Here, as when the hounds start a fox, and the whole pack, giving tongue as the prey breaks cover, set off at his heels, the people learned what, removing all doubt of their being on the right track and after the right man, quickened the pursuit. According to the landlady, he whom they had traced to her house, and who had left it but a few hours before, had conducted himself there in a strange, mysterious way. His bedroom was right above her own; and, through the livelong night, depriving her of sleep, he had paced the floor overhead with heavy step—deep groans mingling from time to time with the tramp of his restless foot. Each of these steps was a step to the gallows. In the judgment of those who had taken up the pursuit they proved him the murderer as plainly as if they had left bloody footprints on the floor. Abandoning now all intention of giving up the chase, they resumed it with renewed vigour ; and in a few hours more the man was in the hands of justice, betrayed by the guilty horrors of his own conscience. However, as there were none there to identify him, and as he gave some feasible explanation of his suspicious behaviour in the inn, he was set free, but not to go off like a shot from a gun, with the speed of one who, to use a common but expressive saying, "had rubbed shoulders with the gallows." For some hours the ruffian circled about the spot, as we have seen a moth in an autumn evening about the candle, till it plunges to perish in the flame. "Murder will out." Contrary to what might reasonably have been expected of a man in his circumstances, like one stricken of God with a blind infatuation, he hovered about the place. He was again seized ; and afterwards was tried, condemned, and hanged. I saw him in the dock in Edinburgh ; and who that has seen, amid the awful silence of a crowded court, a man stand up, while his pale features work convulsively and his fingers clutch the bar, to hear his doom from the trembling voice of a fellow mortal, can forget a scene so awfully suggestive of the last great judgment, and the despair of those who, clinging to Christ's feet, are dragged away to everlasting punishment !

The other case was one connected with my old country parish. Though the respective rights of the heritors on the one hand and the minister, or incumbent, on the other over the church and churchyard are not very distinctly defined, yet, where there is no interference on the part of the landed proprietors, who in Scotland are bound by law both to build and uphold all the ecclesiastical edifices, the control of the church and churchyard is vested in the minister. This in old times was expressed, not in words but in symbol, at his induction, when the keys of the parish church were publicly and formally committed to his hands. Therefore it was that one summer-day I had a visit from a sheriff's officer, or, as some of these officials are called, "messenger-at arms," who presented a warrant requiring me to allow a grave in the churchyard to be opened, and the body to be exhumed and examined. It was the grave of a woman who had resided elsewhere ; but, being a native of my parish, had been brought there to be buried, that, in conformity with a very old as well as common feeling, she might be gathered to her fathers ; her dust might mingle with that of her kindred. Since the funeral, which had taken place six weeks before, rumours had begun to float about that she had got foul play ; and her husband, to whom all the suspicions pointed, had been thrown into jail under the charge of murder. The officer, whose warrant, though shocked by the circumstances and sure that this meddling with the dead would greatly shock the people, I was ready to obey, was speedily followed by other officials and the doctors. They came prepared to examine the body for marks of violence or poison. The news flew like wild-fire through the quiet village beside which my manse, the church, and churchyard stood. It was thrown into an uproar, the natural horror that people feel at disturbing the dead being much aggravated by the outrages which the resurrection men, as they were called—those who rifled graves at the dead of night to supply bodies for dissecting-rooms—were at that time committing on the tenderest feelings of humanity. I believe I incurred some odium by my willingness to aid in the investigation : at any rate, none else would furnish utensils or render any assistance—the few whose curiosity overcame their horror standing far apart as we broke into the house of the dead. The only help obtained was the use of an old empty barn, without which indeed it would have been hardly possible to have examined the body. It was the height of summer ; the day was bright and hot ; and I remember well, when the coffin was raised and the lid forced open, how the whole air seemed instantly filled with a cloud of blow-flies that settled down in thick black swarms on the corpse. On the face-cloth being thrown back and the body unswathed, the spectacle was one, if anything short of divine grace could do it, to humble vanity and the pride of personal charms ; nor shall I ever forget, as I stood at her feet looking on while one of the doctors, with mallet and chisel, was opening the skull, how the dead woman, as if she recognised me, nodded her head at every blow.

On relating that he had gone to see a criminal die under the guillotine, and how he had watched the whole affair with an opera-glass, Lord Byron says it is well to see such things once : and, however repulsive the spectacle, when I have seen some pretty but vain, silly woman come vapouring with mincing steps and haughty air into the house of God, not to worship, but be worshipped, I have thought it would be well that such people, for once at least, saw what they are to become. Nor am I singular in that. It is told of an Italian friar, one of Rome's great Lent preachers—a class of men who often subdue their audience into tears, and by vivid descriptions of hell and purgatory throw women into fainting-fits and men into convulsions—that denouncing on one occasion "the lust of the eye and the pride of life," he fixed his large, black, brilliant eyes on a proud beauty who sat before him, and drove the colour off her cheek. Taking a grinning skull from out the folds of his cloak, he suddenly held it up before her face, to say, See what thou shalt be! There is no sin in admiring beauty. Not the devil, but He gave it who made Eve lovelier, I believe, than the fairest of her daughters; and, whether in the human face and form, or in beast, bird, and beetle, or in the flowers of the field and the gorgeous tints of the evening sky, gave it to be admired, gave it to minister to our happiness and pleasure. The sin lies in worshipping it, setting a too high value on it, feeling proud of possessing it; or, if a woman is plain, envying such as are pretty, and feeling displeased with God for making us what we are. Such a sight as the secret of that grave disclosed was well calculated, with God's blessing, to abase vanity in the dust, mortify pride, and crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts. In that "chamber of horrors" how much to be preferred to a beauty which could turn into loathsomeness, to charms the hand of death had so horribly defaced, appeared what the apostle calls "the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price."

But there we saw something more shocking than the poor unlovely remains—evidences of death cruelly inflicted by the very hand which, on other days, had held that cold hand, when pledges of love were passed and vows were taken to be faithful "till separated by death." The viscera showed unmistakeable evidence of the presence of arsenic—a substance which, unlike vegetable poisons, remains in the body to be, as lawyers say, a damning witness of crime; and which also, being a powerful antiseptic, or corrective of putrefaction, actually preserves the body, whose life it destroys, to speak out at the bidding of the chemist, and convict the murderer of his crime. In many cases of murder, and especially in those where arsenic is administered, the proverb is not true—"Dead men tell no tales." Murder will out, I said to myself, as the knife laid bare another and another red patch on the organs of digestion, betraying the action of a deadly poison. But the truth came out sooner than we expected; and more clearly than might possibly have been the result of a chemical analysis. While we were examining the body, the husband was otherwise occupied. Left in his lonely cell, to the worst of company—a guilty conscience, he had taken alarm on hearing that doctors and officers of justice had gone to exhume and examine the body of his wife. There was nothing remarkable in the circumstance that I should have been the last preacher he had heard, but it was a remarkable coincidence that my text on that occasion should have been so ominous of his fate, and appropriate to his case. Unknown to preachers, God may often be directing them when they take an arrow at random from the quiver and draw the bow at a venture in the pulpit. Whether I shook the sense of security he had been entertaining that, as his victim had been now six weeks in the grave, the fatal secret was safely buried with her till the day of doom, or whether I had roused a sleeping conscience and made a coward of him, I know not; but, curious coincidence to say the least, my text was the words with which the first murderer sought, but vainly, to hide his crime, these, to wit, "Am I my brother's keeper?" On their return, the doctors and law-officers found themselves saved all further trouble. There was no need for the first analyzing the contents of the bottles in which they had carried off portions of the body, nor for the second collecting evidence and preparing a case for the crown. The man was found dead in his cell. He had anticipated the executioner: had cheated the gallows, as they say—hanging himself. Judas-like, he precipitated his fate; and, adding the crime of suicide to that of murder, was found hanging there, a proof that "Murder will out," and an awful evidence also of the Scripture truth, "The ways of transgressors are hard."

Such cases are calculated to produce a sense of a presiding Providence on all minds, but especially on those of the common people, who, as in the days when they heard Jesus gladly, though less learned, often form sounder opinions on moral and religious subjects than those called their "betters." And it was to the deep and solemn feeling produced by such cases, and which, in the common people, as appeared on the occasion I am to refer to, may be more or less tinged with superstition, that I owed a visit, paid me late in a November afternoon, when residing for some time in a part of the country which I had visited years before. The person who waited on me had left the death-bed of an old woman in a cottage in the neighbourhood; and knowing that I was a minister of the gospel, she came to ask me to return with her. It was a peculiar, and in her judgment as well as in that of some others who kindly watched with her, also a "frightsome" and mysterious one. She had stood by many a dying bed, but never by one like it. The woman was dying, and yet could not die; nor, impatient and wearied of the long struggle, could succeed in putting an end to herself—though, awful to relate, they had more than once detected her attempting it. The closing scene, which usually occupies two or three hours, before the curtain falls and all is over, had been prolonged in her case over as many days; and seemed no nearer an end than ever. At first astonished, then puzzled and perplexed, she and other two women who watched with her had at length got frightened. The case was by common; and they had no other explanation of it to offer but the conviction which had taken strong possession of them, that this old dying woman had an awful load of guilt upon her conscience, and that, having in bygone days committed some of those great crimes which God brings to light in unexpected ways, she was not to be allowed to die till she confessed her guilt—making good the old adage that "Murder will out."

HAGAR AND ISHMAEL.

It happened, as will appear in the course of the narrative, that I had become acquainted with the person whose strange mode of dying had given birth to such horrible suspicions, long years before this time: having known her when I was a boy, and renewed my acquaintance with her afterwards under circumstances of which I had a vivid and painful recollection. She had met with her full share of misfortunes, and was dying in much poorer circumstances than once she lived in. But, judging from her state of mind the last time we met, calamity had done as little to humble her haughty heart as age to bend her erect and imposing figure. When she lost her property, she retained all her pride; and, though it was beautifully lighted up when she smiled, it was easy for one quite ignorant of physiognomy to discover in her face, its firm mouth and strongly-marked lines of determination, and in those grey eyes that sometimes flashed from under their shaggy eyebrows, evidences of an iron will as well as of a fiery temper. Like a lonely tree, the hoar and aged remnant of an ancient forest, she had outlived all her early companions: having survived to see succeeding generations, and among them all her children but one, of whom more afterwards, borne to the grave. But no early criminality, so far as I had heard, ever attached itself to her name; yet I knew enough of her to believe that she would have stuck at almost nothing rather than brook public shame; and that, presented with a powerful temptation, she was capable of proving one of those, happily rare, women who have nerve for deeds that most men are too great cowards to attempt—whom Shakspeare represents in the Lady Macbeth of his drama, whom Scotland in our day produced in Miss ——, and England in Mrs. Manning, sitting brisk and lively at the tea-table, with her feet resting on the hearth-stone below which lay the still fresh and bloody form of the paramour she had murdered and buried there. The truth is, that while both men and women stand in continual need of the constraining and restraining grace of God, women make more profit of it, and suffer greater loss by the want of it than men. As the sweetest wines turn into the sourest vinegars and the hottest climates develop in plants and animals the most deadly poisons, so women, with their warm impulses and impassioned tempers, when they become bad, become very bad. In the hands of the Spirit of God, as witness the group by the Cross, they grow into the bravest and most beautiful saints; while in the hands of the devil, as witness Jezebel, and Athaliah, and Herodias' mother, they appear perfect fiends—in fact we could not describe them better than in the words which describe the prophet's figs, "The good are very good; the bad are so bad that they cannot be eaten."

However that may be, and whatever this poor woman might once have been capable of doing or been left to do, I was unwilling, even though I had been superstitious enough to be able, to entertain the suspicions which her strange death-bed had produced in others. Hoping to smooth the thorns of a dying pillow, to guide aright the steps of one who was struggling so hard to get through the dark valley, I agreed to my visitor's request, and soon followed her—but by a short bye-road through a ravine, where I thought I could trust myself to find the way. The period of the year and the scene were in unison with my feelings as I set out on this melancholy errand. The year was drawing to its close. The day itself was dying, fast sinking into darkness. There was hardly light enough to see the footpath which followed the wanderings of a winding stream, that now lost itself under overhanging banks, and now flashed out, reflecting in its quiet pools the last lights of evening. The white stones that stood up among the rank grass of an old burying-ground which I had to pass, presented in the dim light of the gloamin' a weird and spectral look. The shattered towers and gables of an old feudal castle looked grimly down from the summit of a neighbouring rock; turning my thoughts on the brave lords and gay ladies who had long left them to moulder to dust in the quiet grave-yard below, and recalling to memory these quaint lines:—

> The knights are dust,
> Their swords are rust,
> Their souls are with the saints we trust.

Thickly strewed with withered leaves that rustled and crackled under my feet, the pathway itself was associated with solemn thoughts of mortality; and as the night wind sighed and groaned among the naked branches, and the sea came moaning from the bar which the stream had thrown up at its mouth, I felt in a mood to think that it was Nature mourning over the sufferings of her children—the voice of one that, according to the words of Scripture, "groaneth and travaileth together in pain until now."

A little while, and I had found my way to the cottage door; but the scenes I saw, and the lessons I learned there, must be left to form the subject of a future article.

HAGAR AND ISHMAEL.

"Ah me! My son, my son!
Pitiless light pours down the burning sky,
And water there is none."

"My mother! is it night?"
"Th' accursed sun hath blinded his sweet eyes,
Those living wells of light.

"Night in the midst of noon,—
O would that it were death, that he might wake
No more out of his swoon.

"But he will waken wild
With thirst, and rave, and water there is none—
Oh, God! my child! my child!

"Would I my soul could pour
Out like a well-spring in this scorching waste,
That he might thirst no more.

"Would he my life might drain,
As once my breast, I'd hold it to his lips,
That he might live again.

"I cannot see him die—
O God, how canst thou see it up in Heaven,
Nor help, if Thou art nigh?

"Wilt Thou cast off for aye,
Like Abram? Hast Thou not enough for all?
That all may hope and pray.

"Yea, if Thou art the Lord,
Uncovenanted though thy mercy be,
Wilt Thou not help afford?"

She ceased! A stony look
Uplifting to the burning sky once more,
The fainting lad she took,

And lifted him with care
Into the shadow of a rock, and strode
Away in her despair.

She will not see him die;
But hears her heart throb in the voiceless waste
While listening for his cry.

And listening thus there breaks
A mystic murmur on her straining ear—
As from a dream she wakes.

A mist before her eyes
Of angel wings departing—a white cloud
That lessens up the skies.

And at her feet she knows,
From the soft gush among the sinking sand,
The living water flows. I. C. Knox.

BEAR AND FORBEAR:

A PAIR OF BUFFERS FOR UNIVERSAL USE.

In those weary half-hours which now and then you spend pacing a railway platform, waiting for a train behind its time, you are glad to find some occupation for your mind in watching the porters and drivers adjusting trucks and carriages, unshackling some from one train and attaching them to another, or shunting them into the sidings. As you do so, your ear becomes familiar with a sudden bumping sound, as one carriage comes into sharp contact with another, and you see the usefulness of those strange projections which bear the unclassical name of buffers, and are designed to break the force of the carriages as they run against each other. If you are at all in meditative and imaginative mood, you begin to think that something of the same kind might form a useful appendage to human beings:—not, of course, to the outer man, but in the region of the temper, where collisions are so apt to occur. You think how differently some of your friends are constituted in this respect. There, for example, is your friend Ramstam, a blunt, heedless fellow, always bumping up against some one, always taking the bull by the horns, and always requiring some one to arrange matters for him, when he has contrived, as he is always contriving, to get into difficulty. How different it is with your other friend, Mr. Tact! He glides with ease and safety between angry neighbours, like a railway porter between moving carriages, and seems to have some mysterious faculty of adjusting difficulties, managing delicate negotiations, and even saying and doing unpleasant things, without either offending others, or hurting himself. Expressing the difference in railway language, you would say that Mr. Tact was provided with buffers, and Mr. Ramstam with none. And the difference is so great that if all the world were Ramstams, society would be positively unendurable. You are compelled to go in for buffers; elegant or inelegant, they are a great comfort, and whoever devotes himself to promote the use of them does a real service to his race.

It is of a valuable pair of these appendages that we would now treat. The two qualities or habits we have in view are—bearing and forbearing; or, as some one has called them, the two bears. In the Christian sense of these terms no better contrivances could be found for smoothing the intercourse of life, and preventing collision in little matters. If you go into the turmoil of the world without them, you will be familiar all your days with blows and buffets. If you are careful to provide yourselves with them, they will carry you through stormy and dangerous scenes, almost as quietly as if you glided spirit-wise, or as if God had given his angels charge concerning you, and in their hands they bore you up, lest at any time you should dash your foot against a stone.

It is a wonderful power we have got from our Maker—if only we had grace to use it—that of making up our minds to things that are unpleasant. More than half the discomfort of many things seems to disappear when once you have made up your mind to them. A draught of medicine, a surgical operation, a sea-voyage, a large payment of money, a toilsome effort, a great coming down in the world, seem alike to lose more than half their disagreeableness when you have determined to bear them. Formerly, they seemed nothing but tormentors, hateful and horrible to look at; they hovered about you like vultures ready to tear your flesh; the very thought of them was harassing, and threw you into a fever. But when you calmly considered your position, when you saw that they were inevitable, and made up your mind to bear them, their grim, grinning aspect seemed to disappear, and your soul regained its composure and its comfort. The fact is, you caught their sting upon the buffer "bear." The impatient schoolboy, for example, thinks it a dreadful thing to have to learn some odious task. Perhaps he spends half-an-hour, to begin with, in weeping over it, sometimes clenching his fists, gnashing his teeth, and tearing his hair, to vary the expression of his disgust. But when, yielding to better counsels, he makes up his mind to the effort, his misery passes away. His spirits rise as he masters portion after portion in succession; and when at last he closes the book in triumph, he feels at once what a miserable thing it is to kick against the pricks, and how little one would feel the pricks if only one would not kick against them. The control one is enabled to gain in this way over hundreds of the minor miseries of life is amazing. Where this power of accommodation is unknown, the passage through life resembles those dismal scrambles which Dr. Livingstone describes, through thickets of thorn and cactus. Where it is known and used, the thorns seemed to fold themselves up, like the leaves of the sensitive plant, and the traveller gets through with little hurt.

With some persons, this faculty of "bearing" seems almost an instinct. As regards the common troubles of life, it comes to them almost without an effort. Many persons endure a life of toil, suffering, and manifold privations and hardships with a patience that is all the more beautiful because it seems so natural. It is a settled point with them—it has been so, through God's mercy, all along,—that life is not an easy sail down a smooth-flowing river. They have made up their minds to find in it many tempestuous passages and painful experiences, just as they have made up their mind to seasons of storm and winter. It would never occur to them to be angry with frost and snow, or to gnash their teeth at foul weather. As little would they think of being ruffled or enraged at crosses or troubles in their providential lot. The one thing for them to do is to assume a calm attitude, and adjust themselves as they best can to hardships that are inevitable. Like men in business, they lay their account with a certain amount of loss and fruitless labour, and when it comes, they are little disturbed—they know it was to be looked for. Business is not all profit, and life is not all pleasure.

It is very different with another class. Their bristles rise at the slightest cross or unpleasantness, as surely as those of the cat or the tiger at the sight of a natural foe. To learn to bear has been no part of their education, either common or Christian. The effects of this are various in different cases. In some the effect is a constant and passionate irritability, passing, as life advances, into a settled sourness or perpetual grumbling. Such persons cannot be happy, their nerves are as unstrung as if they underwent a daily whipping, they never calm down. The Flagellants that went about in the Middle Ages, with bare shoulders, whipping themselves till the blood streamed down their bodies, hardly could have suffered more self-inflicted pain than those who thus fret and fume daily at every annoyance. What a different life Lord Byron might have led if he had been trained to bear, if he had become reconciled to such trifles as his club-foot, and had made up his mind to a due share of the buffets and snubbings of the world! It is surely one of the most important parts of early training that is neglected when the young are not taught the necessity of bearing. Even in games and recreations nothing is more necessary. How often, when victory seems on the eve of being grasped, fortune suddenly changes, the first are last and the last become first. On the croquet-green, the ball that lay a few inches from the final post may be rudely dislodged at the last moment, and the hopes that had been becoming more eager as the crisis of the game approached, are dashed at the very moment when they were most intense. It is no small achievement to bear this with calmness and good humour; as one succeeds or fails in doing so, one is likely to succeed or fail in meeting the more serious disappointments that are seldom wanting in the struggles of active life.

In another class, the absence of the power of bearing leads to restlessness and constant change. A boy, unused to bear, is apprenticed to an occupation that has its unpleasant features; he hates them, and instead of getting used to them, the longer he continues he hates them the more. He fancies that another occupation will be free from them, but when he makes the change he finds that he has but parted with one set of disagreeables for another; change succeeds change, and at each successive move he falls lower and lower. To boys unaccustomed to "bear," it is steady labour in any form that is the real bugbear; what they try to fall in with is a berth where the labour is not very hard, or at least, not very steady. So much the worse for their own ultimate welfare. How infinitely better for them it would have been to make up their minds at once to a career of patient industry, and get thoroughly used to its wholesome discipline! After all, "it is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth."

Still more, perhaps, the spirit of restlessness shows itself in the case of those whose engagements are for shorter periods. It is only too common for a young domestic servant to leave a desirable situation because of some little unpleasantness which it would not have been very difficult to bear. And how often does she find at her leisure that it would have been better for her to bear the ills she had, than fly to others that she knew not of? I have read somewhere of a person who was told to go through a certain wood, and select a straight rod from its trees, but on one condition, that he was only to cut one, and that he was never to turn backwards for a rod he had once passed. He came upon many that seemed straight, but in the foolish hope of finding one more perfect, he passed through the wood without helping himself to any. So it is with some servants and their situations. Happy the servant who has sense to know and grace to bear the little trials of a lot of average desirableness, and who does not throw overboard advantages of real value, in the vain search for a perfection that cannot be found.

In its best and highest form the power of bearing is a Christian grace. It is a fruit of the Spirit. True Christian charity "beareth all things." And well it may. It has a wonderful pattern of "bearing" in its Master. What did He not bear for our sakes, and what ought we not to bear for his? Nothing serves more to lighten a burden or to make provocations endurable, than love to one for whose sake they are borne. It was easy for Jacob to bear the selfishness and perversity of Laban for seven years for the love he bore to Rachel. It was easy for Paul to bear the hardships of his missionary life for the love he bore to his Master and to the souls for whose good he laboured. It becomes easy for the Christian to bear his crosses, when he does it for the sake of Him who died on the cross for him. Under Christian teaching, too, he gets a far higher and more satisfying view of the end for which such crosses and trials exist. All are seen to enter into the grand scheme of discipline by which he is getting trained for a life of heavenly glory, heavenly purity, and heavenly bliss. There is a philosophical view of trials and hardships that has little or no religion in it, but which is not without a considerable practical effect. People argue that it is more reasonable, more manly, and will be better for them in the end, to endure patiently, than to quarrel with the yoke, or to pollute the air with bootless imprecations. "What cannot be cured must be endured," is one of the maxims they quote, and quote truly; "It will be all the same a hundred years hence," is another. On such maxims as these they fall back, to keep down any rising murmur of impatience, and often with no slight success. But how much higher the considerations that bear upon the Christian, and how much more powerful ought to be their effects! "No cross, no crown," is something far higher than any maxim of worldly wisdom. And no mere philosopher or worldly wise-man ever wrote in this way:—"We glory in tribulations also, knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope; and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given to us." The truth is, when you come where Christ is, when you stand at the cross and recal the life and the love of the Saviour, the spirit of bearing seems to fill the very atmosphere, the high example of Christ has a contagious influence; like Saul among the prophets, the most impetuous temper becomes meek and quiet.

Every one must have noticed the prominent place assigned to patience among the graces of the New Testament. The singular endurance of martyrs and confessors under persecution forms one of the chief glories of the Christian Church. And even in ordinary life, people instinctively feel that a Christian without patience is but a sorry specimen of his order. On the other hand, one of the most impressive marks of real saintliness, one of the features that most undeniably proclaim the heavenly birth, is a habitual serenity, and even benignancy of spirit, especially under trials. This is the power of "bearing" in its highest form. And the beauty of this spirit in the eyes of others is not less than the happiness it brings to its possessor. Let any one study, in some expressive picture or photograph, the face of the two thieves that shared the crucifixion with our Lord. On the face of the one he will see an incipient look of resignation, a subdued air, a meek calmness, contrasting strongly with the unconquered spirit of rage and blasphemy which still distorts the other. Is it necessary to ask which is the more beautiful? Or can there be any doubt which is the more blessed in itself, or brings the happier feelings to its owner? What causes the difference? In the one case the soul, through living fellowship with Christ, has become armed with the power of bearing; in the other, it is exposed without protection to the storm of its own passions, and driven by its own madness, without check or break, to kick against the pricks.

If the power of "bearing" be thus a most happy protection from many of the jars and buffets of ordinary life, that of "forbearing" is hardly less so in its peculiar sphere. The one leads you to endure quietly things that befall yourself; the other leads you to abstain from contending with others on many occasions when you might naturally be tempted to give them battle. One of the best uses of the latter is expressed in the well-known proverb of Solomon,—"A soft answer turneth away wrath." When you are treated sharply, your natural tendency is to treat sharply, or, as the phrase is, to give as good as you got. On second thoughts, you feel that the soft answer is more agreeable to Christian duty, and more likely to prevent sin, and to restore peace; you arm yourself with this safeguard against collision, and when it is brought into play, the waves of passion subside, and immediately there is a calm.

"Forbearing" is especially necessary when two opposite wills are likely to come into collision; and the closer the two persons are to one another, the greater is the need of forbearance. Nothing can be more unseemly than a collision between husband and wife—between those who are one flesh before God, but not always of one sentiment. Opposition on some points it is almost certain there will be; if there be no forbearance on either side, if, indeed, there be not some forbearance upon both sides, there must either be a perpetual jar, or a reign of terror. As often as any matter comes up that causes a difference, there will either be an unedifying wrangle, or the weaker nature will sullenly submit to the stronger, but with a mortifying sense of defeat and wrong. And like a thorn in the sole of your foot during a long walk, or a mote in your eye on a windy day, this little matter may cause no small discomfort throughout life's long journey. Where a little forbearance has been acquired at the beginning, it is as if the thorn were extracted, and the mote removed; and then the journey is made in comparative comfort and peace.

And who has not observed how much in every relation of life harmony and good feeling depend on not pushing things to extremities, not pressing rights to the uttermost, not contending to the death for every trifle? Whether the relation be that of parents and children, masters and servants, partners in business, or counsellors or directors of public companies, it is forbearance that oils the wheels, and enables the machinery to work smoothly, and at the same time efficiently. Of course, "forbearing," like "bearing," must have its limits, and of these I will speak presently. But no small point is gained when the necessity of this quality in some form and to some extent is apprehended by all; when people, and especially young people, come to see that if they are to get on comfortably with their fellows, there must be some forbearance in pressing their opinions or even urging their rights; there must be some consideration even for the infirmities and unreasonableness of others; some care taken not to drive them without cause into open hostility, not to bring things to a deadlock with them. It is melancholy to think what feuds have often raged through want of this forbearance. Even Christian congregations have been convulsed by lasting quarrels that have begun about the merest trifles. A whole neighbourhood has been known to be at daggers drawn on the question whether a school should be built on one site or on another. Neighbouring families have been kept at variance for years because on one occasion a member of the one has sneered at the dress worn by a member of the other. According to the story, the Trojan war had its origin in the fact of the palm of beauty being accorded by the shepherd on Mount Ida to Venus, in preference to Juno and Minerva. How many bloody wars have been due to causes quite as frivolous, it is impossible to say. Of the six millions of men in the prime of life who are maintained by Europe in arms at this day, who can tell how many might be set free for the pursuits of productive industry, to gladden homes and spread peace and plenty, if only there was more forbearance in the temper of nations, and of those who rule them?

But we are wandering into the region of great events, in place of confining ourselves to those of humble or ordinary life. We do not wish so much to show how the great collisions of war may be avoided, as the little collisions of daily experience. Yet, probably, it is just the same spirit of forbearance that would equally prevent the one and the other. One little text of Holy Scripture—"If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men"—written by God's Spirit on men's hearts, would do it all. Only get men generally to have regard to that simple rule of the Christian life, and what a different world you would have! How many domestic brawls, how many children's squabbles, how many ecclesiastical strifes, how many public feuds, how many gigantic wars it would prevent! How many policemen it would supplant, how many regiments of the line, how many iron-clads and Monitors, how many rifled cannon and patent shells! How greatly it would facilitate the transaction of business! How much it would sweeten the breath of society! How much it would do to bring back the balmy breezes of Paradise,—to restore to those that have almost ceased to dream of it, the long-lost golden age!

But how far is one to carry this habit of bearing and forbearing? Is it to extend to every thing? Are we to let ourselves be trampled on as far and as long as men choose to oppress us, and never to strike a blow in defence of our rights or our interests? By no means. And yet, we admit, it is impossible to define the exact limits either of bearing or of forbearing. The settlement of these limits in each case must be left in great measure to what has been called very justly—sanctified common sense. With the counsellors it has to guide it, it will not be very difficult for that faculty to settle where Christian endurance ends, and where weak and cowardly submission would begin. No man can doubt that there are times when it would be a weakness to shrink from a conflict, when Christian manliness cannot but give battle to injustice and oppression. We have no formal rules for determining when such times are, but to sound sense, examining the circumstances and pondering the Word, in alliance with the Christian spirit, it will not be very difficult to find it out. It is no indiscriminate use of "bearing and forbearing" we plead for. It is rather for an intelligent appreciation of their excellent properties on all occasions when it is right to make use of them. If on any occasion we decide not to make use of them, let us at least see that we do so in deference to higher, and not to lower considerations. Let us take care that what we defer to is not our pride, not our spite, not any paltry or selfish consideration, but reasons that have a close connection with the will of God and the good of men. Let us especially see to it that our eye be single, for then the whole body will be full of light. It is the double-minded that are commonly in greatest perplexity as to the path of duty. There never was a more single-hearted man than St. Paul, and there never was a man who knew better where forbearance should end, and resistance begin. "All things to all men" was his motto within certain limits, but if these limits were crossed, no man was ever more uncompromising in the stand he made. There was no bound to his concessions as long as vital interests were untouched, but whenever saving truth was involved, even an angel from heaven would not have escaped the thrust of his weapon. He seemed to have no difficulty in drawing the line between occasions when forbearance might have full swing, and occasions when it would have been treason to give it the slightest scope; but this was due, under God, to his remarkable singleness of heart, united to his strong common sense. The union in St. Paul of forbearance and faithfulness, catholicity and earnestness, width of sympathy and intensity of conviction, was one of the most striking things in his very remarkable character. And withal, he knew how to unite the deepest personal humility with a becoming respect for his rank and privileges. Humble and self-denied to the last degree all through his life, he was nevertheless indignant when his apostolic authority was questioned; he would not leave the Philippian prison till the magistrates came for him, nor suffer insult from the high-priest without remonstrance, nor let the chief captain scourge him uncondemned. Solomon could not have surpassed his skill in determining the time to bear and the time to forbear; and, on the other hand, the time to remonstrate and the time to resist.

If we may get such lessons on bearing and forbearing, from fellowship with St. Paul, much more shall we get them from fellowship with his Master. The very act of prayer, indeed, tends to calm and soothe the spirit. You cannot really go into the Divine Presence and ask from the Father the calmness and patience needed by you in times of provocation, without having your soul tempered to the spirit which you seek. There is something in that Presence that so marvellously subdues the boisterous and stormy, that when we really stand before God, the spirit of tumult can no more prevail than a branch covered with hoar-frost can retain its covering before the mid-day sun. Especially when we realise, that the God in whose presence we are is that God who, in Christ Jesus, has shown to us such marvellous forbearance and forgiveness. What offence on our part has HE not borne? What punishment due to us has HE not forborne to inflict? Shall all this have no effect upon us? Let our nature be what it may, the wonder surely must be, if after we have stood in the presence of this God, we should need further persuasion to induce us to set about practising the twin graces—BEAR and FORBEAR.

W. G. BLAIKIE.

A WORKING CONGREGATION.

I WAS requested to take charge of a class every Sunday at three o'clock; but, to tell the truth, this was not exactly the thing I wanted. I had been in the habit of dining every Sunday with my friend, Mr. Leyton, and of enjoying his very interesting and edifying conversation in his library or his garden; and all this, of course, I should have to give up, since he lived about two miles from the chapel. Nor was it particularly welcome to me, I confess, to be set to work in the second month after I had settled down in this district, and become a member of the church. It appeared to me that it would have been as well to have allowed me—say a twelvemonth, for making acquaintance with the members, before entrusting any part of the work to my care. But such did not seem to be the opinion of the Rev. Mr. Redburn, who was our minister, and undoubtedly one of the most active pastors that ever guided a flock. The church was not very large; it numbered from two hundred and fifty to three hundred members, who formed what is called a "respectable congregation" as they sat in the pews of the well-built Gothic chapel. The district was not very aristocratic, though far from being a low quarter. Indeed, many a well-to-do merchant and prosperous shopkeeper had his villa here, and of these not a few were members of Mr. Redburn's church. By far the greater portion of the population consisted, however, of artisans and poor people. With the exception of a few who worshipped with us, these seemed to think that church-going was a business which ought to be left entirely to the higher class, while they themselves took care that the public-house did not want for frequenters.

Notwithstanding my petty objections, I did become a Sunday-school teacher, for, upon closer examination, I found that, if I refused, I should be the only young man in the church who had not some work to do. My friend Mr. Leyton, who was himself a member of the church, strongly advised me to undertake the duty. "It is just like our minister, to give you some work at once," he said to me; "for he is of opinion that people never get to know each other well, until they work together. And I believe he is right. Mere conversation seldom brings out a man's true character and value. Words are flexible, but a man's work is his soul and life."

I felt there was a deal of truth in what Mr. Leyton said, and so one evening at a meeting of the Sunday-school teachers, Mr. Redburn formally introduced me into their company. It was a very agreeable assemblage, there being about a dozen present. I learnt that I was to take the class of a Mr. Rixdale, who had gone to Australia. A little printed bill was given me, which contained a list of six Bible stories, six texts of Scripture, and as many hymns. My class was expected to learn these well during the ensuing quarter. The boys I had to teach were from eight to twelve years of age, and, on the whole, pretty intelligent. Their number averaged between twelve and sixteen; in my opinion too many for one teacher. I found, however, that they were so well-disciplined, that to keep them in order gave me little trouble, and they were, on the whole, attentive. As I was requested not to introduce other topics than those put down in the bill, all I had to do was to try to make them know the six stories, texts, and hymns thoroughly. The last Sunday of the quarter was appointed for examination. This was conducted by one of the members of the "examining committee," which was composed of members of the church, both ladies and gentlemen, who themselves had been Sunday-school teachers. It was a real pleasure to see how anxious the boys were to come well through the trial, and do credit to their teacher. My class I understood had always been well reported of at the annual meeting, at which the members of the examining committee, in presence of the teachers, the children, and the whole church, gave their judgment as to the progress of each class, and the state of instruction generally in the school. On that day prizes were distributed to the classes according to their attainments during the past year. The class which showed the most regular attendance and the smallest number of wrong answers in the teacher's and the examiner's book, received six neatly-bound books, each bearing an inscription, from the minister and the deacons. Some classes received four books, and some only one. These books were placed in the juvenile library of the church, from which the children could obtain books to read all the year round. A "library committee," consisting of four members, each of whom sat one evening in the month in the library to give out and to receive the books, controlled this work. They, again, were under the supervision of the "examining committee," which once a year took stock, and ascertained whether the books were duly cared for. It would sometimes happen that at the quarterly examination a class proved so backward that the teacher received no fresh bill, and the old one had to be gone through for another quarter. This was reckoned to be the greatest disgrace that could fall upon a class, and the dread of it of course contributed not a little towards keeping up an interest in the instructions.

Though this system of Sunday-school teaching put me under greater control than I had been accustomed to, yet, upon finding that it worked admirably, I soon felt quite at ease. Sometimes little disputes would arise between teachers, or between a teacher and an examiner, but in most cases these differences were settled by the parties themselves, and where this proved impossible, the committee took the matter in hand, and always succeeded in restoring peace.

"I wonder," I said, one day, to my friend, Mr. Leyton, "that our minister so seldom interferes when differences arise between the teachers and the examiners? All are very fond of him, and one word of his would go farther than ten from anybody else."

"Mr. Redburn is a wise man," said Mr. Leyton. "He knows perfectly what he is about. Of course he is the highest official in our little commonwealth. Matters would soon get into confusion if he allowed every trifle to be brought before him. Besides, he would soon break down under the amount of work, and get no thanks but the name of being a pope and a busybody. He is a bad captain who, instead of giving orders, climbs up the rigging to mend a rope himself."

I soon became convinced that this encomium upon Mr. Redburn's wisdom was not exaggerated. Connected with the church was a Dorcas society, which met every fortnight in the schoolroom, as the number of the members was too large to admit of their meeting in each other's houses. This society was not a source of great pleasure to Mr. Redburn. First because, considering its numbers, the amount of work done was comparatively small. The greater portion of the time, I understand, was spent in cutting out the material, which was usually done by one or two ladies, while the others, having nothing to do, filled up the time with talking. And this talking was often carried on in a spirit which, though not incompatible with the rules of respectable society, was certainly not exactly that which might have been expected from a company of Christian women, meeting for a charitable purpose. Mr. Redburn had often expressed a wish that the two ladies who had the management of the cutting would do that portion of the work the day before the meeting. Here, however, he met with stubborn opposition on the part of one of the ladies, a Mrs. Parkes, the wife of one of the wealthiest and most influential members of the church, who said that, having already too much work on hand, she could not possibly spare a morning every fortnight for that purpose. To obviate this difficulty, one of the other ladies had willingly offered to do it for her, but Mrs. Parkes had received this offer almost as though it had been an insult, and nobody had the courage to broach the matter again. Mr. Redburn had never spoken on the subject to Mrs. Parkes herself, nor did he deem it wise to do so in the present state of affairs. She was a very clever and active woman, who, through her influence and wealth, did an immense deal of good in the church and in the district. But it must be said that she was a little imperious, and not very easy to deal with if opposed. The pastor perceived that by irritating her, greater damage might be done to the church than benefit to the Dorcas society.

Still he was bent upon having the Dorcas society freed from its defects. After having reflected on the matter, he was convinced that the only way in which he could keep Mrs. Parkes in good temper, and at the same time get the society improved, was by giving her some work to do in another quarter, and thus disconnecting her from the society. It had often occurred to him that a soup-kitchen, where the poor people might get a basin of nutritious soup for a penny, three times a week, was very much wanted in the neighbourhood. There was an old but substantial little building in a back street, not far from Mr. Parkes' house, which he thought might be easily obtained, and fitted up for the purpose at a slight expense. As this institution might be made the means of bringing the poor people under the influence of the Gospel, it was desirable to have it in connection with the church. Nor could there be any doubt that the church would gladly accept the proposal, if some influential members would put their shoulders to the wheel. Mr. Redburn, knowing that Mrs. Leyton was an intimate friend of Mrs. Parkes, broached the matter one evening in a private conversation with Mr. Leyton, suggesting that his wife might take the opportunity of speaking about it to Mrs. Parkes, without letting her know that the plan had originated with the minister. Not many weeks elapsed before Mrs. Parkes called, one morning, upon Mr. Redburn to ask his opinion about a scheme which had just been brought under her notice—that of establishing a soup-kitchen in the old leather-warehouse in Brackett Street. Mr. Redburn was quite delighted with the idea, and said he had no doubt that, if Mrs. Parkes would take up the matter, and speak about it to other influential ladies, such, for instance, as Mrs. Leyton, and——

"Oh, Mrs. Leyton is quite in favour of it."

"Excellent. And then if you would speak to Mrs. Binny, and Mrs. Hawthorn, and Miss Leeds, I am assured the gentlemen would not keep aloof; and your husband, if he brought the matter before the church, would be sure of general support."

Of course he would. Before three months had elapsed the soup-kitchen was established, and the whole of the management put into the hands of Mrs. Parkes, as the president of the committee of ladies appointed for that purpose. A few weeks later Mrs. Parkes resigned her connection with the Dorcas society, as, unfortunately, the day of its meeting fell upon one of the busiest soup-kitchen days, and besides, she had her hands so full now that, &c. &c.

A thorough reform was brought about in the Dorcas society. On Mrs. Leyton's suggestion the cutting of the material was transferred to another day, so that the ladies could devote all their time to their work. Mr. Redburn then agreed, along with a few elderly gentlemen, who had no business to occupy them, to spend, each in his turn, an hour or two with the ladies at their meeting. These visits were very welcome, as the ladies themselves had felt that their conversation during the meeting often lacked order and substance, and was in need of some controlling influence. Mr. Redburn and the other gentlemen sometimes read a chapter from the Bible and entered into a discussion on it with the ladies. Oftenest, however, some extract from a good book was read, which contributed much towards increasing their knowledge of the Christian literature of the day. The subjects which were thus brought under their notice often became the topic of conversation after the gentleman had departed.

The soup-kitchen, which was admirably managed under Mrs. Parkes' superintendence, proved a real boon to the neighbourhood. It is true the first year closed with a considerable deficit, but Mrs. Parkes knew how to make its burden unfelt by the church.

The poor families which regularly availed themselves of this beneficent institution had now become pretty well known to the committee. Mr. Redburn therefore thought that the time had come for the establishment of some scheme to provide them spiritual food in addition to the bodily nutriment. "Philanthropy," he often said, "is a good thing, provided it leads to Christian charity; if it does not, it is like a railway train that stops half way, and fails to take its passengers to their destination."

One Sunday Mr. Leyton asked me whether I should like to join a society of ladies and gentlemen who were going to unite for the purpose of regularly visiting the poor people in Brackett Street and its vicinity on one evening in the week. Seventeen had already joined, and he said if I had no objection, the number would just be complete for a three weeks' round, each member taking an evening. I counted the evenings of the week on my fingers to ascertain whether I had still an evening left to spare, for since I had become a member of this church, evening after evening had gradually been taken from my leisure time.

"And what is the work we shall have to do?" I asked. "I suppose you wish to make a kind of Scripture-reader of me, to visit the people from house to house and read a chapter and pray with them."

"Well, of course, that's something like it, though not quite the thing we have in view. We do not wish you to visit from house to house, but to take four or five families under your charge which we shall select for you. We find that the number of families which regularly come to our soup-kitchen amounts to about eighty. Now, as there will be eighteen visitors, we reckon that four or five families may be assigned to the care of each of them. We desire each visitor to limit his or her visits to these four or five all the year round, and to regard them as families exclusively entrusted to his or her care. The chief object of this plan, of course, is to bring these families thoroughly under the influence of the Gospel. You would, therefore, be expected to speak to them about the Saviour, to read to them, and to pray with them, if it can be done in a kind and prudent way. By your often visiting the same families, it is hoped that you would gain their affection and confidence, and thus become their friend and counsellor, assisting them in keeping their households in good order, in giving up bad habits, in overcoming difficulties, and giving them useful hints as to the training of their children, and showing them ways to prosperity and happiness they would not otherwise have had suggested to them; and thus prove in every respect a comfort, a help, and a blessing to them."

"A charming idea," said I; "but do you really expect me to realise it? You know that, though I am not a very young man, I am quite inexperienced in the routine of domestic life. You know that my own life has always been very much like a calm stream. It has pleased God to lead me along so gently that I have scarcely if ever had a brush with this world's thistles and thorns. How, then, can you expect me to be a fit comforter for the afflicted, an adviser of those who are worried with care, and a teacher of the married concerning the management of their households, and the training of their children? You might as well send me to Greenland to teach the people how to catch seals."

"Well, if they were bad seal-hunters, you might perhaps be able to tell them where their fault lay," replied Mr. Leyton, with a smile. "One does not need to be a shoemaker to tell where the shoe pinches. It seems a little odd, of course, to ask a young man to be the counsellor and teacher of people many of whom are older than himself; but Solomon says, 'Better is a wise child than an old and foolish king.' Nor is it contrary to Scripture that the Holy Spirit should use the young as teachers of the old. Paul wrote to Timothy, 'Let no man despise thy youth, but be thou an example of the believers in word, in conversation, in charity, in faith, in purity;' and this apostle, than whom married couples certainly never had a better adviser, was an unmarried man himself. It will all depend upon the spirit in which you address yourself to the work. Of course if you mean to enter the houses of the people in the spirit of an arrogant critic, you will be sure to get the doors slammed in your face. But love and humility, on the contrary, will not only open the doors of the houses, but the hearts of the people as well."

"True," I replied; "but you must admit that pure as may be the principle, and good the intention, yet from lack of experience the practice may be unwise and even absurd. I am afraid that, though I acted according to the best of my knowledge, I would often say things which would make the people think there must be something wrong with my brains. Domestic life is a web of so complex a texture that a great deal of practical wisdom is required to know how its numerous threads run, and to unravel its often intricate knotting. And practical wisdom, you know, though a gift of God, is seldom given through the channel of inspiration, but through exercise and experience."

"I agree with you there," said Mr. Leyton; "but we have made provision to meet that difficulty as far as we can. The society of visitors, some of whom are married, will be under the guidance of two committees. One of these will be composed of four married gentlemen, and have Mr. Redburn for president, and the other of four married ladies, of which Mrs. Binny is to be the president. It is proposed that on a certain day every quarter there shall be a meeting of the gentlemen, and, on another day, of the lady visitors, with their respective committees, to have a friendly chat. The visitors would then give an account of their varied experience in their families, and by mutual exchange of thought, advise and help one another. And those visitors who are in need of information concerning practical matters could either obtain it then from their friends, or at least learn the best way to get it. Perhaps in the first weeks of your visiting you would meet with many a difficulty, but I have no doubt these would soon be solved, and their number decrease with every fresh quarter."

I cannot deny that after this explanation the scheme pleased me very much, and not a month had elapsed before I had paid my first visit to the five families which were entrusted to my care. I am bound to say they were wisely chosen. Three of them were married couples without children; the fourth family consisted of a widow with six children, the five eldest of whom were boys of from ten to eighteen; while the fifth was an old man and his daughter, who supported him and herself by working in one of the mills. It appeared that our committees had as far as was practicable assigned the families in which males predominated to the gentlemen, while such families as were blessed with numerous little children were allotted to the married visitors, and especially to the ladies. The families I visited received me very kindly, especially those of them who expected me to afford them some substantial relief. And indeed I could not help sometimes dropping half-a-crown into the hand of one, or a shilling into the hand of another. I learnt at our first meeting of the visitors that this was a mistake, though, much to my consolation, I found that I had not been the only trespasser in this respect. It was observed by Mr. Redburn that it would certainly be at variance with the principles of Christian charity always to keep one's purse closed when calling upon the poor in the character of a regular visitor, but that on the other hand it was a wise rule to open that purse only in cases of extraordinary urgency, and, as much as possible, to tender the gift in the light of a reward for good conduct. One of the visitors remarked that the habit of giving pecuniary aid would be apt to spoil the working of the society altogether, inasmuch as the members were not equally blessed with means: the non-giving visitors would be lowered in the estimation of the poor, and a spirit of envy and jealousy would be kindled. To this Mr. Leyton, who was a member of the committee, added the observation, that injudicious and too frequent pecuniary assistance was also injurious to the very object of the society, which was not to bring the families into easy circumstances through the liberality of others (which would be tantamount to taking away their self-respect), but to raise their social, their moral, and especially their Christian character, and thus to enable them to help themselves through the right application of the principles of the Gospel. "The poor people," said Mr. Leyton, "ought rather to be taught that the Apostle expressed a truth of great practical value when he wrote 'Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise not only of the life which is to come, but also of the life that now is.' The object of the society is, not to show the people the power of money, but of a sound faith in Jesus Christ."

The evening we spent at this meeting was one of the most instructive, amusing, and edifying evenings in the year. All of us soon began to long for the coming of our quarterly visitors' meetings. There was no platform formality, nor anything like the ordinary committee machinery. That we might be able to see each other when speaking, we were seated on chairs in a large circle in the church, regardless alike of age and social position. Mr. Redburn would often sit next to the youngest, and the other members of the committee in the same way dispersed themselves at random among the company. Prayer being offered up, the pastor would call upon the gentleman whose turn it was to open the conversation. This was sufficient to set the discussion going in the most interesting and lively way, observations being elicited, or objections made, or questionable points debated. Reports were never read, nor was every member expected to prepare one; but in the course of the conversation most of us were led spontaneously to tell something of our experience, either to confirm or to oppose some one's observations, or to illustrate some assertion or support a proposal. Some of the cases brought under our notice were very sad, and often the condition of a certain family would become a matter of earnest concern with the whole assembly. Occasionally we were highly edified by the account of a conversation one had had with an anxious soul, an invalid, or a dying person. Sometimes, too, we were greatly amused by descriptions of scenes which had been witnessed, or of the mistakes that were made by the visitor, who sometimes was candid enough, or perhaps sometimes silly enough, to relate his own blunders. On the whole, we took it good-humouredly when we were thus laughed at, since we knew that others had most likely fallen into the same errors of judgment.

Sometimes, when it was deemed desirable, we had a combined meeting of the gentlemen and ladies, which of course was rather more formal than our special meetings. These combined meetings were not so much devoted to discussing questions as to communicating cases in which the ladies were in need of the co-operation of the gentlemen, and vice versâ. Thus, for instance, the ladies would give an account of the character and attainments of boys whom they wanted to have apprenticed to some trade, or the gentlemen would inquire whether the ladies knew girls who were able and would be willing to assist mothers of numerous families in mending the children's clothes or such matters. In this way the society became also a medium through which the poor families could show each other mutual kindnesses.

At one of those meetings our attention was directed to the fact that about seventy per cent. of the individuals above twelve could neither read nor write. The impediment this state of ignorance put in the way of the visitors in imparting spiritual instruction was keenly felt. Several of the poor people expressed a desire to be taught. There could be no doubt that an evening-school for adults would be well attended. It was impossible, however, to obtain a suitable room in the neighbourhood, and so it was resolved to request the congregation to build a room over the soup-kitchen. The matter was brought before a meeting of the church, but here it unfortunately became a source of such contention as retarded the execution of the plan for many months. One of the members, Mr. Leeds, proposed that the room should be built only over that part of the kitchen which contained the washhouse, and that it should have its entrance by a staircase leading up from the street. This proposal was strongly supported by many, because it was undoubtedly the cheapest plan. It was, however, keenly opposed by Mr. Parkes and a few other members. Mr. Parkes said his chief objection lay in the architectural difficulties to Mr. Leeds' plan. What these architectural difficulties were, however, was best ascertained from the comments which Mrs. Parkes made among her friends. Mr. Leeds' plan, she would say, was quite absurd. It would make the building a disgrace to the street, and an object of derision to every passenger. It would make the soup-kitchen look like a huge dromedary, with a large bundle upon its back. She at least would never give her consent to such a mutilation of the soup-kitchen, which, as it was visible from her bedroom window, would be an eyesore to her every morning. In her opinion, a complete storey ought to be raised over the building, with a nice front towards the street. It was true, all the space would not be required for an evening-school, but she was assured that soon some other useful scheme would be begun for which the superfluous room would be useful and highly desirable.

Now, certainly this plan was much more acceptable in every respect than that of Mr. Leeds, except as regarded the expense; for, upon due inquiry, it appeared that Mr. Parkes' proposal could not be properly carried out unless the whole building were taken down and an entirely new two-storied house put up, which would cost at least £400; whereas Mr. Leeds' plan would only require an outlay of £80. After there had been many meetings and repeated discussions, the church at length resolved that Mr. Parkes' plan should be carried out if the required sum of £400 could be raised within twelve months. One of the members thereupon moved that the collecting of this sum should be entrusted to the children of the congregation. It had, he said, been evident on previous occasions how effective was the activity of the children in collecting. Many a good work in the vineyard of the Lord owed its existence to the indefatigable and disinterested zeal of the "little ones." Now, in his opinion, the building of an evening school for adults was, more than any other work of God, a task that should be laid upon the children, since in no other way could the children better show their gratitude for the education which they had received, and which guarded them against the ignorance that so sadly marred and hindered the happiness of the poor.

This motion was strongly opposed by Mr. Leeds. He could, of course, he said, have no objection to an expensive building being erected in the room of the present one, if the proposers and advocates of such a costly plan provided the required means to carry it out; but he could not see how, with any show of reason, the burden of it should be laid upon the shoulders of the children. In his opinion, the employing of children for collecting purposes ought not to be resorted to so readily. It was a matter of a highly delicate nature. As far as he was able to judge he was of opinion that the sending out children, in the name of Christ, to beg money merely for a matter of luxury, could not fail to degrade the cause of religion in the estimation of the young themselves.

This observation again raised the flame of contention in the assembly. It is true the speeches were all delivered in a tone quite becoming a Christian congregation; but the parties now took different sides so decidedly, that I feared the result would be the failure of the entire plan of building a school-room. Happily, Mr. Redburn succeeded in preventing this fatal issue. He observed that on the one hand it certainly could not be said that the erection of an entirely new house was imperatively necessary; but, on the other, it was also saying too much, if the whole of it was called a mere matter of luxury. Taking the sum of £400 as a fair representation of the value of the proposed building, and keeping in mind that, according to Mr. Leeds' estimate, £80 would be required for the building of a school-room, he calculated that out of the total sum one-fifth, i.e. £80, would go to providing the poor with a useful and necessary institution, while the remaining four-fifths, or £320, would go to satisfying the architectural taste of Mr. Parkes and his friends. Now he felt assured that neither Mr. Parkes nor any other member of the church would desire the children to collect £320 for the gratification of architectural tastes. He felt equally sure that neither Mr. Leeds nor any one else would have any objection to the children collecting £80 for a school-room for the poor. So he moved that the children should be requested to try to collect the £80, if Mr. Parkes and his friends would pledge themselves to raise the £320 within twelve months hence.

This proposal at once gave a cheerful turn to the discussion. The general and continued applause of the whole congregation left no way of escape for the proposers of the expensive plan. Mr. Parkes rose with an air of mock reluctance, and accepted the pledge. Ten months had not elapsed before the new building was finished. It contained a splendid soup-kitchen below, according to Mrs. Parkes' desire, and a lofty school-room on the first floor, according to the wish of the visitors.

And thus an institution came into existence which very soon proved a real blessing to the neighbourhood. It opened up a new channel for useful work to the members of the church But I should be too prolix were I to tell the whole story just now, and must therefore keep it in reserve for another article.

IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.

THE EMBASSY OF THE BAPTIST—THE GREAT INVITATION.

St. Matt. chap. xi.

OUR Lord's public ministry in Galilee began at the time that John had been cast into prison, and had now continued for more than half-a-year. There was much in this ministry which those disciples of the Baptist who kept aloof from Jesus could not comprehend. There was the entire absence of that ascetic rigour and stern denunciation of all iniquity, by which their Master's character and teaching had been distinguished. There were no fastings, no prescribed repeated prayers, there was the call of a publican to be an apostle, there was the eating and drinking with publicans and sinners. All this appeared to them not only different from, but inconsistent with the idea of that kingdom, of whose advent their Master had announced himself as the herald. Some of them carried their doubts and difficulties to John himself in the prison, Hearing from them of the works of Christ, the Baptist sent two of their number to Jesus, and bade them put to him the question, "Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?" As coming from John himself, and meant for his personal satisfaction, the question certainly would imply that some temporary misgiving had crept over the Baptist's mind. It is somewhat difficult to believe after the revelations made to him, after what he had seen and heard at the baptism, after his own repeated public proclamations of it, that his faith in the Messiahship of Jesus had been shaken. His long and unexpected imprisonment, however, must have severely tried his faith. To such a man, from infancy a child of the desert, who had roamed with such free footstep through the wilderness of Engedi, who, when the time came for his manifestation to Israel, had but exchanged the freedom of his mountain solitudes for those liberties of speech and action he took with his fellow-countrymen, the months of his imprisonment must have moved slowly and drearily along, turning even his strength into weakness. The chilly damp of being hurried unexpectedly from Herod's presence and his former open active life into the cheerless, idle solitude of the prison, fell all the chillier upon his heart on his coming to know that Jesus was apprised of his imprisonment, yet no message of sympathy was sent, no movement for his deliverance was made. His notions of the coming kingdom may not have been different from those entertained at the time by the apostles and other followers of Christ. Perhaps he fancied that at the setting-up of this kingdom all injustices, and oppressions, and spiritual wickednesses in high places were to be done away, the axe to be laid at all their roots, the fan to be so used as thoroughly to purge the threshing floor. Perhaps in rebuking Herod as he did, he thought that it was but a first blow dealt at that which the mightier than he who was to come after him was wholly to destroy. And when, instead of his expectations being fulfilled, he was left unvisited, uncheered, unhelped; and he heard of the course which Jesus was pursuing, gathering crowds indeed around him, but carefully abstaining from announcing himself as the Messiah, or doing anything towards the erection of a new kingdom,—in some season of disquietude and despondency, perplexed and a little impatient, sharing their feelings, and in the hope of at once relieving their doubts and removing his own misgivings, he sent two of his disciples to put to Him a question which might be the means of drawing from Jesus a public declaration of his Messiahship, and of inducing Him openly to inaugurate the new kingdom.*

The messengers arrived and delivered their message at a very opportune conjuncture. "In the same hour he cured many of their infirmities and plagues, and of evil spirits ; and unto many that were blind he gave sight."† Jesus kept John's messengers for a season near him instead of answering them, going on with his healing work. He then turned to them and said, "Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard ; how that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, to the poor the Gospel is preached." It is not simply to the miracles as displays of superhuman power that Jesus appeals ; it is to their kind and character, as peculiarly and prophetically Messianic. Jesus had, hitherto, refrained from assuming the title of the Messiah or announcing himself as such. John by his messengers urges him to do so. Christ contents himself with simply pointing to such works done by Him as the Baptist could not fail to recognise as a fulfilment of those prophecies of Isaiah, in which the days and doings of the Messiah were described. Nor can we fail to notice that, side by side with the greatest of the miracles, reserved as the closing crowning testimony to the Messiahship, is the fact that to the poor the Gospel was preached ; to the poor as well as to rich, to no favoured people, class, or section of mankind, to all in that universal character which all sustain as sinful, responsible, immortal. The words that Jesus added, "And blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me," may have carried with them a special allusion to the Baptist, while proclaiming the blessedness of the man who was not offended at the patience and gentleness of Jesus, his readiness to wait and to suffer, to invite and encourage, rather than to denounce and to punish.

Having given them what seemed a sufficient answer, Jesus sent John's messengers away. He had something more, however, to say to the people that was not for the Baptist's ear ; which must not be said till the messengers were gone. What they had just seen and heard was fitted to create an unfavourable impression, as if the faith, or fortitude, or patience of John had utterly given way. Eager to shield the character of his forerunner, Jesus turned to the multitude and said to them concerning John, "What went ye out into the wilderness to see? A reed shaken by the wind?" a man bowing and bending as the reed does before every passing breeze, a man fickle of purpose, changeable in faith, believing at Bethabara, disbelieving now at Machærus. Not such a man is John ; rock-like, not reed-like—such as he was in the wilderness, such is he in Herod's keep. "What went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment?" caring for the comforts and luxuries of life, or a man who, all negligent as he had been of these before, feels now the hair-cloth to be too hard a garment, and would fain exchange it for a softer one? Not such a man is John. The wearers and lovers of soft raiment you will find in palaces, not in prisons. John cares as little for such raiment now as when of his own free will he chose the hair-cloth as his garment. "But what went ye out for to see? A prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and more than a prophet."—The only one among all the prophets whose course and office were themselves the subjects of prophecy, whose birth, like that of his Great Master, an angel was commissioned to announce ; his predecessors seeing but from afar across the breadth of intervening centuries, he, the friend of the bridegroom, standing by the bridegroom's side, his office such towards Christ as to elevate him to a height above that ever reached before, yet this kind of greatness, one springing from position and office, as local, external, temporary, not once to be mentioned alongside that other kind of greatness which is moral, spiritual, intrinsic, eternal. "For this is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. Verily I say unto you, Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist ; notwithstanding he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he."

More than one public testimony had been borne by John to Jesus. Jesus answers these by the witness He thus bears to John. But as He thinks of himself, in conjunction with the Baptist, the strange and inconsistent treatment that they respectively had met with from the men of that generation presents itself to his thoughts. (Matt. xi. 16—19.) It is but seldom that anything like criticism or complaint touching those around Him comes from the lips of Jesus. All the more interesting is the glance that He here casts, the judgment that He here pronounces upon the men of his own age and nation. Addressed by two different voices, speaking in two different tones, they had turned a deaf ear to both. The rigour of the Law came to them in the message of the Baptist ; they took offence at it. The gentleness and love of the Gospel came to them in the message of Jesus ; they took equal offence at it ; justifying in either case their conduct by fixing on something in the character or lives of each of the two messengers which they turned into matter of complaint and accusation ; guilty of great unfairness in doing so, exhibiting the grossest inconsistency, charging opposite excesses upon John and upon Jesus, saying of the one that he was too austere and ascetic, that he had a devil—saying of the other that He was too free and social, that He was a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, the friend of publicans and sinners. Had it been any other two of Heaven's chosen messengers that they had to deal with,

* Many think that it was for the sake of his disciples, and for their sakes alone, that the Baptist sent them on this errand, not that he had any doubts himself, but that he knew they had. It is altogether likely that he had some regard to their establishment in a true faith in Christ. The question, however, put into their lips comes too directly from himself, and the answer is directed too plainly and pointedly to him, to allow us to shut out the idea of personal relief and satisfaction being contemplated.

they might have had less difficulty in fixing on some irregularity or eccentricity of conduct out of which to fashion the shelter they sought to construct. But that even with them they tried this expedient, and imagined that they had succeeded, only shows to what lengths that principle or tendency of our nature will go which seeks to mix up the claims of religion with the character of its advocates.

But now the Saviour's thoughts pass onward from the contemplation of that folly and inconsistency which a familiar similitude borrowed from the market-place may expose, to dwell more profoundly upon the conduct of those cities wherein most of his mighty works were done. In endeavouring to follow and fathom from this point onwards the train of our Lord's reflections, as recorded by the Evangelist, we enter a region remote and very elevated. "Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works, which were done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes." "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works, which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day." Who is He who announces so confidently what certain communities would have done had they been placed in other circumstances than those which they actually occupied, and what altered outward destiny would have followed the different course pursued? "It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon and for the land of Sodom at the day of judgment than for you." Who is He who anticipates the verdicts of eternity, pronouncing so confidently upon the greater and the lesser guilt, fore-announcing the lighter and the heavier doom?

But now before the eye of the man Christ Jesus, there spreads out a section of the great mystery that hangs over this world's spiritual history. Here are men—these inhabitants of Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum—involved in all the greater guilt, incurring all the heavier doom, in consequence of the presence of Jesus in the midst of them. They were men—those inhabitants of Sodom, and Tyre, and Sidon, who, had they lived in an after-age and enjoyed the privileges bestowed upon the others, would have repented and shared in all the blessings of the heavenly kingdom. How many questions, as we stand in front of facts like these, press upon our thoughts and rise to our trembling lips—questions touching the principles and procedure of the Divine government as affecting the future and eternal destinies of our race—questions we cannot answer, that it pains and perplexes us to the uttermost even to entertain? It is in this very region that there comes one of the greatest trials of our faith. Was there no trial of the like kind for the man Christ Jesus, as He, too, stood gazing down into these depths? In what way or to what extent the human spirit of our Lord lay open to that burden and pressure which a contemplation of the sins and sufferings here and hereafter of so many of our fellow-creatures brings down upon every thoughtful spirit that has any of the tenderness of humanity in it, it is not for us to determine. But that He who was tempted in all things like as we are did at this time feel something of this burden and pressure, seems clear from the attitude into which He immediately throws himself. "At that time"—when thought was hovering over this dark and awful region—Jesus lifted up his eyes to heaven. Some light has broken in upon that darkness from above, drawing his eyes upwards to its source. Some voice from above has spoken, that comes, as his own came upon the troubled waters of the lake, to still the inward agitation of his thoughts. "Jesus answered and said, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth!" Infinitely wise, infinitely merciful, infinitely loving Father, thou art Lord of heaven and earth. The past has all been ordered—the future will be all arranged, by Thee, and in thy character and purposes and providence over all as at once the Father and the Judge, the solution lies of all that to created eyes may seem obscure. "I thank thee . . . that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." Why are the things that belong to their eternal peace hidden from some and revealed to others, hidden from so many, revealed to comparatively so few? One beam of light falls upon the darkness here, and for it the thanks are given.

It is not an arbitrary distinction, drawn by a capricious hand that loves to show its power. The fate of Sodom, Tyre, and Sidon was not one that it was impossible for them to have evaded, that nothing could have turned aside. They might have repented, and had they repented, the ruin had not come. A thick cloud, charged with bolts of vengeance, hung over Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum because of their unbelief. All over the land it was but one of a family, or two of a city, who had welcomed the Saviour and his message. The right interpretation of all this was not given by saying that it was by a divine decree that had no regard to the character and conduct of each, that the eyes of some blinded and the eyes of others opened to the heavenly light. It was from the wise and prudent, who thought themselves so much wiser or better than others, whose pride it was that blinded them, that the Gospel was hidden. It was to the babes, to the humble, the meek, the teachable, that it had been revealed. And it is not so much for the hiding it from the one as for the revealing it to the other that Jesus her gave thanks. On two after occasions of his life He had each of the two alternatives—the hiding and the revealing, separately and exclusively before Him, and the difference of the emotions felt and expressed by Him marked the difference of their effects upon his mind and heart. Would we know what impression the revealing made, let us plant ourselves by his side as the seventy return from their brief but successful mission, and tell Him of the results; when without a shadow on his joy, He rejoices in spirit, and repeats in words the very thanksgiving that He now offered. Would we know what impression the hiding made, let us plant ourselves beside Him as He beheld the city and wept over it, exclaiming "O, Jerusalem, Jerusalem! if thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes."

But is it a full solution of the mystery that those left in darkness have themselves, by their wilfulness, and pride, and carnality, created a medium through which the heavenly light cannot pass? Why is it, if the spirits of all men are equally and absolutely beneath the control of the Creator, that any are suffered to remain in such condition? There is no answer to such a question, for, take up the great enigma of the doings of God and the destinies of man at what end you may, approach it from what quarter you please, adopt whatever method of solution you may prefer, make your way through the difficulties that beset you as far as you can, sooner or later you reach the point where explanation fails, and where there is nothing left for us but to join with Him who said "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight."

The occasion now before us may have been the first in which Jesus was seen and heard in the act of prayer. The stopping of the current of his address to them by the offering up of a short and solemn thanksgiving to his Father in heaven must have made a deep impression on the multitude. It was singularly fitted to excite wonder and awe, and to lead them to inquire what the peculiar relationship was in which Jesus stood to the Great Being whom he so addressed. Was it not as one reading their thoughts and graciously condescending to unfold so much of the mystery of his Sonship to the Father, that Jesus went on to say, "All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; . . . . and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him." The Baptist, in his closing testimony to Jesus, had declared, "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand." Jesus now takes up and appropriates this testimony. With special reference, we may believe, to the things hidden and revealed of which he had been speaking, he says:—All things—all those things concerning man's relationship to God, and his condition here and hereafter, have not simply been revealed, but been delivered to me,—handed over for adjustment, for discovery to, for bestowal upon men; and chiefly that of the true knowledge of God. Intimate and complete is the mutual knowledge which the Father and the Son have of another, a knowledge in kind and in degree incommunicable. It is the Father alone who knoweth who the Son is; the Son alone who knoweth who the Father is. "As the Father knoweth me," said Jesus, "even so know I the Father."* Finite may measure finite, like comprehend its like, man know what is in man, but here it is infinite embracing infinite, the Divine Son and the Divine Father compassing and fathoming the Divine Nature, and the Divine attributes belonging equally to both.

And yet there is a knowledge of the Father to which man may reach, yet reach only by receiving it through the Son. Had we been told simply that no man knoweth the Father but the Son, nor the Son but the Father, we should not have known to which of the two we were to look for any such acquaintance with either or both as our finite minds are capable of attaining; but when Jesus says no man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him, He announces himself to us as the sole revealer of the Father; this no small or secondary part of his gracious office, to make God clearly known to us as our Father which is in heaven. To some obscure and partial knowledge of the Supreme Being as Creator, Upholder, Sovereign, Governor, we may attain without help of this revelation of Him by Christ, but if we would know Him in his living personality, know Him as a God not afar off but near at hand, know Him in all the richness and fulness of his mercy and love, know Him as a pitying, forgiving, protecting, providing, comforting, reconciled Father, we must get at that knowledge through Christ, we must see him as the Son reveals Him. No man knoweth thus the Father, but he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him. But who is he to whom this revelation of the Father is offered? Let the broad unrestricted invitation with which the statement of the Saviour is immediately succeeded supply the answer:—"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." This invitation loses half its meaning, taken out of the connection in which it was spoken. We understand and appreciate the fulness and richness of its significance only by looking upon it as grounded on and flowing out of what Christ had the moment before been saying. At first sight it might seem as if there was something like confinement and contraction in the preceding utterances of Jesus. He claims all things as committed to Him. Otherwise than through Him nothing can come to us. He tells us that for all true knowledge of the Father we must be indebted exclusively to him. As to our knowing and receiving, does this not seem to narrow the channel, to present to our eyes a confined contracted stream. Yes, it looks so as we gaze upon this channel and the stream which flows through it as lying outside our earth, spanning the mysterious distance between it and Heaven; but watch it as at its nearest end this channel touches the earth and spreads out its waters on every side, and then see how all narrowness and contraction disappears. "All things are delivered unto me of my Father." But why so delivered, why put so exclusively into his hand? Simply and solely that they might so easily, so freely, so fully come unto ours. For us to go elsewhere than to Him, to expect that otherwise than through Him we are to receive anything, is to resist and repudiate this ordinance of the Father. But He has all, He holds all as the Treasurer of the Kingdom, the Steward of the Divine mercies, the sinner's divinely constituted Trustee and He has all and holds all under the condition that there shall be the freest, most unrestricted, most gracious dispensing of all the treasures committed to his custody, that whoever asks shall get, that no needy one shall ever come to Him and be sent unrelieved away. "No man knoweth the Father but he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him." But does He niggardly withhold that revelation, or restrict it to a few? No; wide as the world is, of all who seek to know the Father that knowing Him they may have peace, so wide is the unlimited invitation spread. In many a sublime attractive position do we see Jesus standing while executing his gracious office here on earth—in none loftier or more divine than when placing Himself in the centre of the wide circle of humanity, and, looking round upon the millions of our race,—labourers to weariness,—with this or that other burden pressing them to the earth, with the full consciousness of one who has the power to relieve all who come, he says :—"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Rest,—this is what our inward nature most deeply needs ; for everywhere, in every region of it—in our intellect, our conscience, our affections, our will—the spirit of unrest, like a possessing demon, haunts us with its disturbing presence. Then let us see how Christ would have us bring these vexed souls of ours to Him, that from every such haunted region of it He may cast the vexing demon out.

Our intellect, in its search after God, is in unrest, re-echoing the ancient plaint, "Oh that I knew where I might find him! . . . Behold, I go forward, but He is not there ; and backward, but I cannot perceive Him : on the left hand, where He doth work, but I cannot behold Him : He hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see Him." There dawns upon us the sublime idea of a Being infinitely wise, and just, and good, author of all and orderer of all, but through the clouds and darkness with which his guidance and government of this world is so densely swathed we begin to lose sight of Him. Looking at Him as revealed alone in the ways of his Providence, we get perplexed as we look around upon a world in which such oppressions, wrongs, injustices are done, where might so often triumphs over right, where sin and misery so fearfully abound, where death comes in to close the short-lived, chequered scene of every earthly life. Faith begins to lose its footing, now believing and now doubting, now all things clear, now all things clouded, restlessly we are tossed as on a troubled sea. What we want is some firm ground for our faith in God to rest on : Jesus Christ supplies that ground in revealing this God to us as our Father, in telling us that such as He, Jesus, was, in love and pity and care and help to all around him, such is the God and Father of us all to the whole human family. In our anxiety to get one true clear sight of that Great Being whose doings we contemplate with such a mixture of awe and of uncertainty, we are ready with Philip to say :—"Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us." The answer comes from the lips of Jesus, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip ? He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." It is a Father of whose love we have the earthly image in the love of Christ, who rules the world we live in. Can we doubt any longer that wisdom, mercy, justice, and love shall direct the whole train of the administration of human affairs, the whole treatment of each individual of our race.

There is unrest in the conscience. A wounded conscience who can bear ? The sense of guilt as it rises within the breast who can quench ? The dark forebodings that it generates who can clear away ? They tell us our fears are idle ; we try to believe them, and put our foot upon those fears to tread them down, but they spring up afresh beneath our tread. They tell us that God is too merciful—too kind to punish. We try to believe them, knowing that God is a thousandfold milder, more merciful than thought of ours can conceive ; but we have only to look within and around us upon the sufferings that sin inflicts, and the vision of a Divinity that does not, will not punish, vanishes like a dream of the night. Where then can our conscience-troubled spirits find repose, where but in Him who hath taken our sin upon Him, in whom there is redemption for us through his blood, even the forgiveness of all our sins? If we may go to Christ for anything, it is for this forgiveness. If we may trust Him in anything, it is in the bestowal of this gift. If among the things that have been delivered unto Him of the Father, there be one that more clearly and conspicuously than another is held out to be taken at once from his most gracious hand, it is the pardon, the peace, the reconciliation with God, offered to us in Him. If we put these aside, or will not take them as the fruits of our Lord's passion, death, and righteousness, purchased for us at that great cost to Him, gratuitously bestowed on us, then if the higher instincts of our moral and spiritual nature come in any degree to be quickened, what a weary toilsome fruitless task do they set us to execute! These instincts tell us that we are the creatures of another's hand, the dependents on another's bounty, the subjects of another's rule, that to Him our first duties are owing, that against him our greatest offences have been committed, that to stand well with Him is the first necessity of our being. How then shall we remedy the evil of our past ingratitude and disobedience, how shall we bring things right and keep things right between us and God ? Oh ! if all the anxious thought, and weary labours, the prayers, the pains, the self-restraints, the self-mortifications, the offerings at all the altars, the giving to all the priests, the sacrifices—personal, domestic, social, of affections, of property, of life—that have been made by mankind to turn away the apprehended wrath of Heaven, and to work themselves into something like favour with the powers of the invisible world ;—if they could be all brought together and heaped up in one great mass before us, what a mountain pile of toil and suffering would they exhibit, what a gigantic monument to the sense of sin, the power of conscience in the human heart ! With a most mournful eye we look upon that pile as we remember that it has been heaped up needlessly and in vain, that all that was wanted was the ceasing on the part of those engaged in it from the effort to establish a righteousness of their own before God, the ceasing to revert to any such methods to ward off the displeasure or to win the favour of the Most High, the ceasing to repair to such harbours of refuge as churches, altars, priests construct : and the opening simply of the ear to the words of Jesus, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

There is unrest in our affections. Here they foolishly wander, there they bitterly are checked, at times dammed up by manifold obstructions, at times running wildly to waste, ever seeking, never finding full allowed complacent rest. And why ? Because nowhere here on earth can a being or object be found on which we can safely, innocently, abidingly lavish the whole wealth of that affection which the heart contains. For the right placing, the full outdrawing, the perfect and the permanent repose of the heart, we want one to love—above us, so that reverence may mingle with esteem; like us, so that closely andfamiliarly we may embrace—one in whom all conceivable excellences meet and centre, all that the eye covets to admire, that the heart asks to love. We seek for such an one in vain till we hear Jesus saying, Come unto me, and I will give you rest. We go, and all, and more than all, we asked for, could think of, we find in Him. Grace and truth blended in perfect harmony, a beauty undimmed by a single blemish, a sympathy constant and entire, a love eternal, unchangeable, which nothing can quench, from which nothing can separate. Here at last, and here only, do we find one wishing to be loved and worthy to be loved with the full devotion of the heart. Restless till it lights on Him, with what a warm embrace when it finds Him does the heart of faith clasp Jesus to its bosom! "What is thy beloved more than another beloved?"—may the watchmen of the city say. The answer is at hand: "My beloved is the chief among ten thousand, he is altogether lovely. I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine—my Lord, my God, my Shepherd, Saviour, Kinsman, Brother, Friend."

There is unrest in the will. It is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. It aims at, it attempts independence. We would be our own masters, we will not have another to reign over us; and so, instead of the quiet of a settled order, there is confusion and anarchy within. All, indeed, is not left absolutely loose, unreined, unregulated. A yoke of some kind we all are born under, or willingly take on. Some assume the yoke of a single passion of their nature, and if that passion be a strong one, such as covetousness, it is not long ere it turns the man into a slave, making him a mere beast of burden—time for nothing, care for nothing, taste for nothing, joy in nothing but in working for it and under it. And the more work done for it, the more does it impose, its day of labour without any quiet evening tide, its week without a Sabbath. Nor does it mend the matter much if instead of one there be many such yokes about the neck, jostling one another, fretting and galling the wearer by the force and variety of the impulses that drive him in this direction and in that. It is to all mankind as bearers of the one yoke, or the many, that Jesus says—"Take up my yoke, throw off these others, the yoke of pride, of covetousness, of sensuality, of worldliness, of ambition, of self-indulgence,—take on that yoke which consists in devotedness to me, to duty, in a life of self-restraint, in a struggle with all that is evil, a cultivation of all that is beautiful, and good, and holy. A hard yoke you may think this to be, but believe me, my yoke is easy, my burden is light, easier and lighter far than those you are groaning under."

One great reason why we are unconscious of the comparative lightness and easiness of this yoke of the Christian discipleship is that we take it on in the spirit of fear, and of a selfish mercenary hope, instead of with that trust and love and gratitude which are the soft wrappings which, laid beneath it, make it so easy to be borne. It is as those who have been redeemed to God by Christ's most precious blood, whose sins have been all forgiven them for Jesus' sake, whose peace has been made up with God through him; it is in the spirit of child-like confidence, looking up to God as our Father in heaven, and to Himself as having ready in his hand for us the grace and strength we need, that Jesus would have us take up every duty, face every temptation, endure every trial, of the Christian life. But if instead of this it be with a doubtful mind and a divided heart that we put forth the hand to take on the yoke—if we do this, not so much to render a return for a great benefit already received, as to add to our chance of receiving that benefit hereafter—if it be for peace and not from peace, for life and not from life that we are working—what is this but trying without throwing it off to shift the old yoke of self a little, loosen some of its fastenings, and by their help try to attach to us the new yoke of Christ? Is it any wonder that, encumbered thus, there should be little freedom of motion, little capacity for, and little enjoyment of, the work of faith and labour of love? As ever we desire to know how truly easy the yoke of Jesus is, first let us enter into the rest that at once and in full measure He gives to all who come to Him—the rest of forgiveness, peace, acceptance with God. And then, as animated and strengthened by the possession and enjoyment of this rest, let us assume the yoke, that in the bearing of it we may enter into the further rest that there is for us in Him—the rest of a meek and lowly heart, gentle, resigned, contented, patient of wrong, submissive under suffering, a rest not given at once or in full measure to any; to possess which we must be ready to enter into the spirit of those verses of Toplady:—

"Fain would I my Lord pursue,
Be all my Saviour taught;
Do as Jesus bade me do,
And think as Jesus thought.
But 'tis Thou must change my heart,
The perfect gift must come from Thee;
Meek Redeemer, now impart
Thine own humility.

Lord, I cannot, must not rest
Till I thy mind obtain;
Chase presumption from my breast,
And all thy mildness gain.
Give me, Lord, thy gentle heart,
Thy lowly mind my portion be;
Meek Redeemer, now impart
Thine own humility."

WILLIAM HANNA.

MARIE.

A VISIT TO MARIE, A FRENCH HEROINE.

It was a charming afternoon in July when, with my friend Madame Sancourt, I walked up one of the hills on the border of the Lake of Geneva. We walked slowly, not merely because the road was rather steep and the atmosphere warm, but also because, with almost every fresh step, Nature disclosed new beauties to our delighted eyes. It seemed as if the Creator had here brought together all the treasures of his inexhaustible store to bless and beautify this earth of ours. If we desired to admire Nature in the magnificence of her grandeur we had only to wait for the moment when a winding of the path enabled us to look through a gap in the mountain range, towards the south, where Mont Blanc stood at a distance before us, piercing the sky with his snow-clad summit. A few steps more and another winding brought us to an opening, through which we had a panoramic view of the loveliest of valleys, where the evergreen fir groves and the flowery meadows, the broad shades of the hills, and the picturesque villas basking in the afternoon glow, formed as it were a concert of colours, which was like music to the eyes. Then again, turning to the west, the lake spread itself out before our view, its azure crystal contrasting with the everlasting verdure of the hill-slopes, and reflecting the numerous houses, villas, castles, and churches, which adorn its banks, like the fantastic carvings in the frame of some majestic mirror.

Language is too poor fully to express what we thought, felt, and enjoyed. Madame Sancourt had seen these beauties of Nature perhaps a thousand times before, yet she gazed at them as if, like myself, she now saw them for the first time.

"The grass withers and the flowers fade," she said, when at length we turned down a road that led into a village in the valley, "but the ideas of God which they are meant to express are always fresh and new. What sublimity of design, what a sense of the good, the beautiful, the true, must there be in that Mind in which the conceptions of such tableaux arose, and what skill and power to compel dead matter thus to realise those conceptions!"

Madame Sancourt was a painter, but she was not one of those artists who, while admiring the beauty of Nature, are blind to the truth which it embodies.

"To see the work is heaven," she said; "to see Him who made it must be the heaven of heavens! Ah!" she added, after a pause; "that was a true word which the Lord spoke when He said, 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.'"

This was not an expression of the mere sensitiveness common to artists. What I mean is, she did not quote that text merely for the sake of the beauty or sublimity of the thought it conveyed. It was the expression of a grave truth which had engrossed all her thoughts, feelings, and desires. To witness a pure heart, cleansed through faith in Christ, was a greater enjoyment to her than even the sight of the most charming landscape or the grandest masterpiece of art.

We were on our way to partake of such an enjoyment now. We were going to visit blind Marie, an old woman, who lived in the village at the bottom of the hill. This, however, was not Madame Sancourt's first visit. She had known Marie for years, and, weather permitting, she used to spend a few hours with her every Friday afternoon, to read to her and to comfort her in her affliction. And she never came with empty hands either, as witness the little basket which she this time allowed me to carry, and which contained a sweet-smelling nosegay, a dozen of new-laid eggs, and some of the choicest fruits of her garden. What the basket contained in winter time I cannot tell; but love is exhaustless in its contrivances; it always knows the secret of turning water into wine, and gathering roses in a desert.

We entered a neat-looking cottage at the entrance of the village. The door was opened by an old woman, who had a wooden leg. I have seldom seen such an ugly face, but, at the same time, I never saw a face the ugliness of which was so perfectly subdued and overcome by the expression of kind cordial love, which expressed itself through each one of those irregular features. Good old Jeannette! I always remember her with pleasure. She was a dear ugly creature.

"Ah, you have come at last!" she exclaimed, with delight. "I say, madame, it is, indeed, too bad to keep us hanging so long between hope and fear. You know when the clock strikes four, and you have not made your appearance, we get very anxious about you. But it is all right now, and I hope you will stay long this time."

The loquacious woman hobbled away through a passage, which led into a little garden. A venerable-looking blind woman, apparently of about sixty-five, was sitting on a rustic seat, busily engaged in knitting. Nor was she by any means what you would call a beautiful old woman. It was evident from the cast of her features that, by birth, she must have belonged to the poorer class of society. But there was an uncommonly sweet expression noticeable in her weather-beaten face, a solemn calmness, which seemed to have been acquired through many a hard inward struggle.

"Oh, I'm so glad you have come!" she said, as Madame Sancourt impressed a hearty kiss upon her cheek. "I have got a letter from Hadschi, which you must read. It is such a good letter."

"From Hadschi!" Madame Sancourt exclaimed joyfully. "And how is she? Is she doing well?"

"Excellently. But you will learn all about her from her letter? And whom have you brought with you?"

"A friend from England, who upon hearing of your love to Jesus, was desirous of making your acquaintance."

I took Marie's hand, and she responded with a cordial pressure. Jeannette now brought chairs for us, and Marie said,—

Friends from England are always welcome. It was through an English child of God that I was [illegible] the Saviour. But that happened more than thirty years ago, and she is in heaven now; at least, I think she must be, for I have never got [illegible] from her or about her for twenty-five years."

"Were you in England at that time?" I asked.

"No, I never was in England," answered she with a smile; "though I often wondered that I never got there, for I have been wandering about a great deal [illegible] with Louisa Munro, which I shall remember as long as I live."

"Dear Marie has gone through many a strange experience in her lifetime," said Madame Sancourt, gently laying her hand upon that of her blind friend: "and she will be glad to tell you something about the [illegible] with her; will you not, dear?"

"Of course, of course," was the ready answer; "but we must first read Hadschi's letter. I long to hear it read again, especially as there are some expressions in it which Jeannette could not well make out."

Jeannette, who had in the meantime emptied Madame Sancourt's basket in the kitchen and placed the fragrant nosegay in a glass vase, now took her seat beside us.

"Well," she said very merrily, in reference to Marie's last remark, "I venture to say I have learnt to read my good French language perfectly, but Hadschi scribbles down names which only Turks and Moors could pronounce. That isn't a language for Christian people."

"But who is Hadschi?" I asked.

"A dear Christian sister at Algiers," said Madame Sancourt, "whom the Lord converted from Mohammedanism to the love of Christ, through the instrumentality of our Marie."

"I will tell you about her by-and-by," Marie said; "and you will love her when you know her story."

The letter was then read. As to style and language, it certainly was a curious document, and I could not wonder at good Jeannette not having been able to decipher every word, for there were many expressions which, but for Marie's explanations, would have been perfectly unintelligible to me. The spirit and purport of the letter, on the other hand, were most excellent and edifying. The writer of it was evidently a true child of God, overflowing with the love of Jesus, through whom she had found forgiveness of all her sins, and in whom she rejoiced as the only and sure foundation of her hope and peace for time and for eternity. It seemed to me from her letter as if she were engaged as a nurse in some hospital. She wrote with great joy of three or four Mussulmans whom she had been the means, in God's hand, of leading to Jesus before their death. But it appeared that she had to suffer a great deal of annoyance and persecution both from the Mohammedans and the Roman Catholic priests, because her Gospel work was making much progress among the people of the district in which she laboured.

"What power of faith!" I said; "and that in a Turkish woman too! She puts many a Christian to shame."

"She does, indeed," said Marie; "and so do the Turks in many respects. They are commonly cried down and spoken of as fanatics, but their fanaticism is owing to their religion, not to their character. They are on the whole a noble, honest, serious people; that which they acknowledge as truth and religion is everything to them. Theirs is not that light-minded flippant spirit, so common, alas! to our nation, which has no scruple in trifling with the highest and most serious concerns of mankind. Whatever the Turks may be, scoffers they are not. They may err in religion, and in their error commit great sins; but it is only because they throw heart and soul into what they believe to be agreeable to God, and conducive to securing their future happiness. They are a thoroughly believing people, and if once their faith is directed to the right object, you will find them prepared to sacrifice themselves body and soul for the spread of the knowledge of it. Such, at least, is my dear beloved Hadschi. I never met with a more determined and dangerous opponent so long as she believed that I was an enemy of God. But no sooner did she see her mistake, and learn the truth as it is in Jesus, than she became the most devoted friend and the stanchest ally I ever had in my struggle for the Cross against the Crescent.

"And how did that remarkable change come about?" I asked.

"We were together in the service——"

"Permit me to interrupt you," Madame Sancourt interposed. "Would it give you too much trouble to tell the story of your life to my friend? It will enable him the better to understand how you became acquainted with Hadschi."

"But you have heard it so often," answered Marie; "I am afraid it will be rather tedious to you."

"And if you should tell it for the thousandth time," cried Jeannette, "I am assured madame would listen with the same pleasure as if she were hearing it for the first time. It is just like a Bible story, showing that Jesus knows how to make his enemies his friends, and how He works in the soul of a poor lost sinner."

"Well, then," said Marie, "to begin at the beginning:—"I was born of Roman Catholic parents at a village near Marseilles, and trained up for kitchen work, as my father kept an inn, where many people used to dine. I was thus perfectly instructed in the art of preparing food for the body; but of the food that nourishes the soul I knew next to nothing. I could read and write well, but that there was such a book as the Word of God I knew not. I used to go to mass every Sunday, but what it really meant I could not tell. I said my prayers to the image of Mary, but who Mary was I did not care to know, and nobody sought to tell me. I was a careless, merry-hearted pleasure-loving girl, though from an innate sense of respectability and decency I always kept clear of disorderly conduct. Adversities deprived my father of the means of subsistence, and brought him to the grave. As my mother had died a few years previously, I was left alone in the world at the age of eighteen. I went to Marseilles, and got a situation as cook in a gentleman's house.

"My master was a Greek, who carried on an extensive shipping trade with the Levant. His wife, I believe, was a Jewess. But, indeed, whether either of them had any religion at all I cannot tell, for I never saw them go to church or chapel, nor engage in prayer. My fellow-servants were stanch Catholics, but just as ignorant as I was. Our mistress permitted us to attend worship regularly, but as I had often to cook a sumptuous dinner for a numerous company on Sunday, I frequently stayed away from church, and at length left off church-going altogether. I did so with the less scruple because I observed that my fellow-servants did not become a bit wiser or better for all their church-going and paternosters. Some of them were very bad characters indeed, and these were exactly the most bigoted of the lot. I considered myself far superior to them as to virtue and honesty, and since I did not find that I became less virtuous and honest by leaving off church-going and praying, I saw no reason to resume those habits which I now looked upon as quite useless.

"Still, I did not feel quite at ease with what I called my 'common-sense religion.' Often when alone in my bedroom I would look up to the stars that glittered in the sky above me, and think: 'The people who inhabit those beautiful worlds must be very happy, and a great deal better than any of us. I wonder whether I shall go there after my death? But no,' I would often add, with a sigh, 'I am not good enough for that.' Notwithstanding my high opinion of my virtue and honesty, I could not help feeling that there was something wrong with me. I believed that there was a God who made all things, and I could not deny but that it was right to worship Him and to pray to Him. Sometimes this thought would so haunt me that, in a sort of frenzy, I took to mumbling a hundred Pater nosters in rapid succession, till I would fall asleep on my pillow. The next morning I would feel ashamed of this, but still, I thought, it could do no harm at any rate.

"Though I had the use of both my eyes in those days, yet I groped about in greater darkness than surrounds me now. But it pleased the Lord to permit a ray of light to pierce the darkness. Owing to his extensive mercantile connections, my master frequently entertained guests from foreign countries. An English family, who were on their way to Malta, came to the house and stayed with us for several days. The lady's maid, a girl of my own age, of the name of Louisa Munro, slept in my room. She spoke French very well, as she had lived for three years in Paris with the family. I observed that she knelt down and prayed before going to bed, and that she did the same in the morning before leaving her room. What struck me most, however, was her not crossing herself. I wondered what strange religion hers could be. I noticed a little book in which she read a page after her prayer. She left it on the mantel-piece one day, and no sooner had she left the room than I took a glance at it. It was written in English, so I could make nothing of it. But my curiosity was greatly excited, and the next evening when I saw her again read and pray, I asked her what book it was. She answered that it was a New Testament, and when I appeared not to know what that meant, she explained by saying that it was the Word of God, from which we could learn the way of salvation. Then, unlocking her box, she produced a French copy, and made me a present of it.

"This was my first acquaintance with the Bible. As soon as I found a moment's leisure, I took to reading a few pages, in which I met with a great many things I did not understand. And no wonder; for I did with this book just as I used to do with the novels: I turned up the last leaves first, to ascertain whether all ended beautifully. So I got quite confused in the visions of the Apocalypse, and becoming tired of them soon, I laid the book aside with a feeling of disappointment. I thought it was a book full of fables, and wondered how such a sensible girl as Louisa could say that it taught us the way of salvation.

"I often thought of this afterwards. Undoubtedly, the distribution of the Bible cannot be too strongly recommended and promoted, but I believe that, as in every good work, so also in this, zeal should be guided by wisdom. The distribution of the Bible among totally ignorant people should as much as possible be combined with some instructive remarks about the manner in which this book ought to be read, and about its contents. Had Louisa left our house that same day, I believe her having given me the New Testament would have produced an effect upon me quite contrary to what she meant to produce.

"Fortunately she remained long enough to put me in the right way. She showed me in a kind way that the folly did not lie in the book, but with myself, inasmuch as it was always a foolish thing to read the last pages of a book first. She then gave me a simple but very clear and distinct summary of the life of Christ and the foundation of the first churches, interspersing her tale now and then with a passage from the Gospels or the Acts. I was so deeply interested in all I heard that we continued this conversation till day-break.

"'We must go to bed,' she said at last, 'and try to get a little bit of sleep for a couple of hours or so. But try to go to sleep with the sweet thought that Jesus loves you, that He died for you, that He desires to save you from your sins and from this wicked world.'

"All this made a deep impression upon me. Louisa prayed with me the next morning, and entreated me to give myself up as a lost but believing sinner to the only Redeemer. Her words were greatly blessed to my heart. When she left for Malta we parted as sisters in Jesus.

"We kept up a constant correspondence after her departure. My life with my fellow-servants now became very unpleasant. The more I learnt of the Gospel and the more Christ became precious to me, the more I loathed the worldly-minded, gay, and often blasphemous conversation in the kitchen. I tried to open the eyes of my fellow-servants to the awful consequences to their souls which their way of thinking and living could not fail to have, and to lead them to Christ; but their furious enmity against the word of God soon compelled me to hold my peace. I now became an object of hatred and derision, and at length I resolved to look out for another situation. Louisa wrote me to come to Malta, as she knew a good place for me in an English family who wanted a French cook. No offer could have been more acceptable than this, as it opened up to me the prospect of seeing my good friend again.

"Alas! I was too sanguine in my hopes. I never saw her again; but our joy will be all the greater when we meet in heaven. The ship in which I took passage for Malta was not one of the regular packet-boats, but a small merchant-vessel, the captain of which was an acquaintance of mine, who offered me a free passage. Bad weather, which continued for two days, and at length increased to a furious tempest, drove us altogether out of our course towards the coast of Barbary. A thousand times I was in despair of my life, and my faith in Christ, which had but so recently sprung up in my heart, was severely tested. By the grace of God it came out only the more strengthened and confirmed. I now knew from experience that Jesus, and Jesus alone, is sufficient to enable one to look death in the face, not only without fear, but with joy.

"No sooner had the storm subsided, and preparations begun to be made to regain our lost course, than we found that we had only escaped one danger to fall into another which was not less fearful. A pirate ship made up to us. The resistance of our crew, gallant as it was, proved in vain. Our captain was killed. With the mate and the sailors, who were most of them wounded, I was transferred to the pirate ship, and the next day I was sold as a slave at a place some twenty miles from Algiers.

"Picture to yourself my condition. If ever it was a great mercy that I knew in whom I believed, it was so now. Had this calamity befallen me a few months earlier, I am assured I should have made away with myself. I now encouraged myself in my God, who was my true Master, since He had bought me with a much more precious price than silver and gold. I knew that my soul was in his hand, and that men would have no greater power over my body than He would allow.

"My master was a wealthy Turk, and a great landed proprietor. He was more humane than I had ever believed a Turkish despot could be. With a gang of slaves I was sent into the fields, and the work which I had to do in the heat of the burning sun was very hard upon me. I was several times beaten, because the overseer thought I was lazy; but when our master, who now and then inspected us, observed my rather delicate constitution, I was transferred to his pleasure-garden. There was nothing but light, and indeed agreeable work, in store for me here. I had to water the flower-beds, to clean the paths, to bind up the shrubs, and to attend the chief gardener's only child, a nice-looking girl about my own age, of the name of Hadschi. She was an intelligent, brisk, lively person, whose dark shining eyes seemed to throw out fire when she was animated. She was very easily irritated, and would often burst out in rage, especially when contradicted, for her imperiousness knew no limits. But she was also easily calmed down by meek submission, and if spoken to in a gentle way, she would always acknowledge her fault. In short, she was a hot-tempered but thoroughly honest creature.

"The Lord enabled me to behave myself so as to gain the affection and confidence of my young mistress. As we lived at a considerable distance from the town, we were seldom visited by strangers. Hadschi had thus no friend, and scarcely enjoyed any conversation. She felt very lonely, and looked eagerly for a heart into which she might pour out her own. At first she took little notice of me, since she could not understand me, nor I her; but gradually I learnt to speak Arabic, which was the general language of the country, and after two years I was able to express myself as fluently in that tongue as in my own. The more I was able to understand Hadschi's thoughts and to communicate mine to her, the greater was the pleasure she took in my company. She was quite delighted to hear me speak about France, the customs and manners of our people, and the strange things which we had invented to make life comfortable. She at length became so attached to me that she asked her father to allow me to be always with her, and so I was raised to the rank of her confidential friend, from whom she had no secret, and from whom she withheld no benefit which it was in her power to bestow.

"Hitherto I had always avoided speaking to her about religious matters. My conscience would often remonstrate with me on account of this; but I lacked courage to broach the subject. I knew that she was a fanatical Islamite. I had been so fortunate as to keep my New Testament concealed from the eyes of the pirates, and during my trials this precious book was my faithful consoler. Now that I was in comparatively prosperous circumstances, it often became my reprover. When I read such sayings of the Lord as, 'Whosoever shall deny me before men, him shall I also deny before my Father which is in Heaven,' my heart would tremble within me; but other texts, such as 'Do not cast your pearls before swine,' or, 'Be wise as serpents,'" would again tranquillise my disturbed mind. Still, that tranquillity seldom lasted long. Hadschi often spoke of the Koran, from which she would recite such portions as her religion made it imperative upon her to know by heart. She would also three times a day prostrate herself and exclaim, 'God is great, and Mohammed is his prophet!' I witnessed all this in silence; but a voice within me would whisper: 'Why do you allow that poor erring soul to continue in a way which you know to be a way of perdition? Why do you not maintain the honour of the true Saviour with the same faithfulness with which she exalts the false prophet?'

"These accusations of my conscience many a night robbed me of my sleep. I loved Hadschi indeed. I had never loved any one as I loved her; she was so kind, so tender-hearted to me. She allowed me to read her very heart so freely; and, save the errors and absurdities of Islam, all I read in that heart was noble, amiable, and true. I was so attached to her that I felt I could have allowed myself to be burned to save her life. Yet—what a strange mixture of contradictions is the human heart!—to save her soul from everlasting perdition I had no courage.

Not because I dreaded the serious, perhaps fatal, consequences which my efforts might bring on myself, when it became known that I, an impudent slave, a Christian dog, had tried to make her an apostate to the only true religion; but because I felt almost assured that my attempts would not only be in vain, but render her still more fanatical than she was, deprive me for ever of her friendship, and ruin me for life, without anything being gained by it. Indeed, what I dreaded most of all was the depth of misery into which I should be sure to plunge her loving heart, when, through what she would regard as imprudent proselytism, I should have robbed her of the best and only friend she possessed in this world.

"'But,' my conscience would interpose, 'is it right to love her more than Jesus? Has Jesus not a right to claim her? Is it true love towards her that bids you keep her separated from Jesus, when He has perhaps brought you hither for the express purpose that you should lead that lost sheep to the only good Shepherd?'

"This fearful struggle made me perfectly miserable. It told upon my health so much that I drooped visibly. My pale cheeks and emaciated form did not escape Hadschi's notice. She anxiously inquired into the cause of it, but I gave her evasive answers. She remonstrated with me on account of my reserve, and sometimes she even besought me with tears to open my heart to her. It was touching to see how she exhausted all her wit to guess the reason of my grief. Was it because I mourned over my absence from my own country and friends? Was it because I regretted the loss of my liberty? Was it because I was separated from a young man to whom she supposed I might be betrothed? She promised me everything that was in her power if I would tell her. Sometimes, too, she burst into anger, and commanded me to divulge the secret. But then, when she saw how she frightened me, she would give way to tears, and fall on my neck and sob.

"At length my conscience became too powerful for me. Now that Hadschi herself besought and bade me tell her what was in my heart, my cowardice and unfaithfulness became the more contemptible in my own eyes. I well remember one sleepless night that I passed. In the morning I came to a firm resolution. I entreated my God to make me faithful, even unto death. Peace then re-entered my long-disturbed soul: I was prepared to drink the bitter cup.

"'My dearly beloved friend,' I said to Hadschi, when the next day she again insisted upon my revealing my secret, 'permit me to tell you a story of what happened in my own country many years ago. Once there was a prince in the land of the Franks who became seriously ill. His physicians were called, and they prepared a draught which he was to take three times a day. Now the prince had a servant who loved him tenderly; this servant was in possession of a very old book of prescriptions, which a holy man had at one time given to one of his ancestors. The remedies which this wonderful book prescribed against all possible diseases, even those which were deemed incurable, had always and in all cases proved perfectly effective. The servant also knew that the prince's physicians were not well instructed men, that in their ignorance they had mixed poisonous herbs with the ingredients of the compound, and that, consequently, the draughts which they had prescribed for the prince would only make him die a slower and crueller death. On the other hand he knew also that he only needed to prepare the remedy which his book prescribed to cure his beloved master at once, provided that he could be persuaded to take it. Yet, in spite of all this, he did not prepare the remedy, neither did he speak a word about it to the poor patient.'

"Here I stopped.

"'For shame, the traitor!' exclaimed Hadschi. 'I hope they bastinadoed him till he died.'

"'Don't be too rash,' I said. 'The poor servant was in a fearful state. He knew that the prince put perfect confidence in his physicians, and regarded every one who spoke a word against them as slanderers. At the same time he was almost assured that the prince would not only refuse to take the remedy which he could have prepared, but would suspect him as a poisoner, cast him into prison, and order him to be strangled. Now what was the poor man to do?'

"Hadschi was silent. 'A dreadful condition,' she said at last with a sigh. 'I really don't know. And what did he do?'

"'He at length overcame his fear,' I answered, in a serious voice; 'he spoke out his mind to the prince, come what might. The prince, after some hesitation, believed him: took the remedy, and was cured.'

"'Glorious!' exclaimed she, clapping her hands with delight. 'And what reward did the good man receive? Did the prince make him his chief physician?'

"'No doubt he would have done so,' I replied, 'but——'

"'But?'

"'The enraged physicians made a conspiracy, and poisoned both the prince and he who had saved him.'

"'Horrible!' exclaimed Hadschi, rising and pacing up and down the verandah in which we were sitting. 'And is it a true story?' asked she, with child-like curiosity. 'Has it really happened?'

"'Well, I cannot tell whether it ever has happened,' I answered, with a hesitating voice, 'but it may happen still.'

"'Oh, it is a riddle!' cried she, joyfully; 'let me try to guess it!'—and, the better to concentrate her thoughts upon it, she screened her dark sparkling eyes with her fan.

"'You will never find it out,' I said, gently pulling down the fan, and looking her tenderly in the face. 'Let me at once tell you the application: I am that poor servant.'

"'You?' asked she, with a voice of astonishment. 'And who is the prince?'

"'It is you, my dear Hadschi.'

"'But I am not ill,' replied she.

"'Not as to the body, thanks be to Allah, but I believe your soul is in great danger. Oh, do forgive me my boldness, my own dear friend and mistress, but I am only obeying your own behests, and fulfilling your own entreaties. It is this which has of late made my soul sad, taken the sleep from my eyelids, undermined my health, and made me miserable day and night.'

"'For Heaven's sake what is it?' cried she, in a voice of fearful emotion. 'Is there a conspiracy against me? Are there people who will kill me?'

"This turn of thought was not unnatural. Owing to her hot temper she had made many enemies among her slaves, and she knew that some of them hated her.

"'Don't be alarmed,' I said, 'nothing of the kind is the case as far I know; I told you that I did not believe your body but your soul was in danger.'

"'What then do you mean?' asked she, resuming her usual calmness. 'Do speak out your mind, dear Morja.'

"'Permit me to put one question to you,' I said, in a grave voice. 'Are you certain that Mohammed is able to save you?'

"When this question passed my lips, it was as though an electric shock had gone through her frame. An expression of terror fell like a dark veil upon her face; with a shriek, the piercing, terrifying sound of which I shall never forget, she started up from her seat, and running away as quick as her feet could carry her, she fled from me as she would have fled from a serpent.

"I did not see her again that day, nor did I see her for three subsequent days, during which, by her strict orders, I was confined to my room. Nobody in the house marvelled at this. It was a common thing to see her, in a moment of passion, order a slave to be thrown into prison. It was much more a matter for wonder to the household that I had continued so long without imprisonment, and how it was that I was not cast into the common dungeon, but permitted to remain in my room.

"On the morning of the fourth day I was ordered to come to her divan. She looked sad and severe. I noticed that her eyes were red with weeping.

"'Morja,' said she to me, without beckoning me to sit down next to her, as I had been always used to do, 'do you know that you have forfeited your life by speaking of the Great Prophet to me in the way you did?'

"'I know.'

"Tears filled her eyes.

"'How could you do such a thing?' said she. 'What evil have I done to you that you thus insult me?'

"'Evil?' I replied, bursting into tears; 'evil, my beloved mistress! No evil at all, you never did me anything but good. But you remember my parable? Why did the servant speak to the prince against the draught which his physicians had administered to him?'

"There was a pause.

"'You consider our prophet a false one?' she said in a pensive tone. 'I know the Christian dogs call him the false prophet.'

"'Permit me to ask you one question.'

"'Ask, then.'

"'How do you know he is a true one?'

"'By Allah! should I not know that? The priests of God, our Imans, have taught us and our fathers from the beginning of the Hegira. And did not the great prophet, blessed be his name! receive the Koran from the hands of the Angel Gabriel himself?"

"'May I venture again to ask a question, my beloved mistress?'

"'You may.'

"'How do you know that your priests are well instructed? Perhaps they are like ignorant physicians who take poisonous herbs for wholesome medicine. As to the Koran, it contains many truths, but also many untruths. If my beloved mistress knew the story of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, she would herself see that Mohammed cannot be God's prophet, nor make one eternally happy.'

"While I was saying this, I trembled all over, for I expected an outburst of anger such as would crush me. To my great surprise she remained calm, and after a pause, she said:—

"'What is that story of Jesus Christ? Is it beautiful? Is it a true story?'

"'It is as beautiful as it is true.'

"She beckoned to me to take my seat next to her, and bade me tell her the story of the Gospel. I began with the birth of our Saviour and the miraculous events by which it was attended. She listened with the greatest attention. She appeared deeply struck with the unsophisticated simplicity as well as with the divine sublimity of the sacred narrative. She put so many questions to me that we did not proceed farther that morning than the murder of the innocents at Bethlehem. But in the afternoon she sent for me again. She was too anxious to hear the continuation of the story to be able to bear my absence any longer.

"I should weary you were I to give you an account of the conversations which from that day took place between Hadschi and myself about the history of our beloved Saviour. Indeed, we scarcely spoke about anything else from morning till night. The more she became acquainted with the person of Jesus, with the words which He spoke, with the great deeds which He performed, with his unspeakable love and tender mercy towards the lost sinner, with his holy indignation against the hypocrite, the more she became lost in admiration, and the more she desired me to speak of Him. But when I thereupon told her about his crucifixion, his death, and his resurrection, and explained to her why He died, showing her that He died for our sins, and also for her sins, and that without his blood there was no remission of sins nor salvation possible, a terrible struggle rose in her heart, and she burst into such a violent passion that she again confined me in my room, and refused to see me for many days. I could not think but that all my hopes concerning her conversion were now gone, and that my doom was sealed. I cast myself at the feet of the Saviour, and prayed for her and for myself, for I now expected nothing short of being soon thrown into prison or strangled.

"Nor was this fear unfounded. I learnt at a later period that the conversation which took place between Hadschi and myself about the Christian religion had been overheard by one of the slaves who hated me, and was envious of the favours which I enjoyed. She reported what she had heard to Hadschi's father, who sharply examined his daughter upon the matter. Hadschi's faith in Islam was even at that time much shaken, but she knew that nothing would be in store either for her or for me short of a cruel death if her father should discover even the slightest hint of what was going on in her heart; she therefore told him that she had only entered upon religious topics with me, to convert me to Mohammedanism. Her father doggedly replied that this was not at all her business; that a dozen lashes on the sole of the foot were a far more effective means to convert a Christian dog than a thousand discourses, and that as soon as a priest should make his appearance, he would send him up to me. I need not tell you what would have been my lot if that plan had been carried out. A fanatical Iman leaves to his victim no other alternative but to submit or to die.

"But Providence prevented Hadschi's father from carrying out his plan. One day, while I was trying to break the deadening monotony of my solitude by humming a hymn in a scarcely audible voice, I heard the report of guns at a distance. I had as early as daybreak observed that an unusual noise and bustle were going on in the grounds. During the morning, however, all had become quiet. I now heard distinctly that a fight was going on. The sounds came nearer and nearer. Suddenly I heard the noise of horses approaching at full speed. They came close to my window, and picture to yourself my transport when the cries: 'Vive la France! Vive le Roi!' sounded in my ears. My window was only shut in with Venetian blinds. I forced them open, and saw the well-known uniform of our hussars. I stretched out my arms towards them. 'Amis!' I cried, 'au secours!' I then swooned.

"I shall not detain you by a detailed description of the great change which now took place in my condition. Our army had taken Algiers, and was engaged in subduing its environs. My master, and Hadschi's father, with nearly all the male population of the place, were killed in the fight. The females were taken prisoners, and conveyed to Algiers. The captain of the hussars, on learning that I was a French woman whom he had been the means of rescuing from slavery, received me with an expression of joy which could not have been greater had I been his own child. He placed me in one of my late master's carriages, and had me escorted to the town by a company of hussars. The commander of the town received me kindly, and left it optional to me either to return to Marseilles with one of the Government ships, or to take charge of the female ward of the hospital, where there were many Mohammedan patients. I chose the latter. I need not tell you that my hope to find out Hadschi, and to be a comfort to her in her affliction, contributed not a little to helping me to this decision.

"I had not much trouble in finding her out. She was one of the patients. Her fearful mental struggles during the last few weeks, and the subsequent events, by which she was made at once an orphan and a prisoner, had told too much upon her system. I found her in the delirium of fever. Among the names which she uttered in her wanderings that of Jesus and mine occurred the most frequently.

"I shall not try to express to you the delight with which she recognised me after the crisis had passed. She recovered after a few weeks, and, what is more, she rose from her sick bed to a new life in Jesus Christ her Saviour. I had no difficulty in prevailing upon the governor to appoint her as my assistant in the hospital. Nor could I have desired a better one, for she soon showed a talent for nursing which I have never seen surpassed.

"The three years we spent together at Algiers I shall never forget. The Spirit of God had entirely broken down her former pride, softened her impetuous temper, and made her another Mary, sitting at the feet of Jesus. In the midst of infidelity and superstition, we two formed a church by ourselves.

"Then came the sad time of parting. Our efforts, however cautious, to lead our patients to Jesus, excited the suspicion at once of the Roman Catholic and Mohammedan priests. Very likely we should have been dismissed some day, had not the hospital, being only a temporary one, been broken up. I was given to understand that I should please the governor by quitting the colony. This was a hint clear enough to make me resolve to go to Marseilles. Hadschi, though perfectly at liberty to go where she chose, yet resolved to stay in her native country. What would have been the use of her going with me to a country the language of which she could not speak? Besides, she was convinced she could labour better for the Lord among her own people than among us. She joined the troops which were going to fight Abd-el-Kader in the mountains of Morocco. The military surgeon gladly accepted her offer to serve as a nurse in the infirmary. After some years she was the means of converting a young French nobleman, who was a patient under her treatment. He married her, and for her sake settled in Algiers as a private gentleman. Here she founded a little hospital for Mohammedans, of which she took the management, her husband paying all the expenses. It is to that good work of hers that the letter refers which Madame Sancourt was so kind as to read to us.

"To return to my own biography. As I had earned a little money at Algiers, I resolved to try to earn my livelihood by keeping an infant school. I hired a small house at Marseilles, in the neighbourhood of the Faubourg de Bayle, and soon had my little schoolroom filled. In the evening I went out to visit the sick poor people, as I still kept up my fancy for nursing. I stayed many a night at their sick beds, and had the joy of seeing my work blessed for the good of many a poor lost suffering soul. My services in this line seem to have been reported in higher circles; at least, I was soon requested to nurse patients in well-to-do families, who, of course, remunerated me for my services. This enabled me to engage my dear friend and sister in the Lord, Jeannette, to keep the infant school in my stead."

"Ah," said Jeannette, with a smile, "but you ought to tell how you got me. I was, humanly speaking, a poor, almost dying creature, madame; but for your——"

"Hush, hush!" Marie interposed; "there is no necessity for telling all that here. Suffice it to say that Jeannette kept the school very well, and so I could go out nursing. But one evening, when on my way to a poor patient, my attention was drawn to a girl who was crying. I learnt that she had fled from a disreputable house, and found herself friendless and penniless in the world. I took her to my house and allowed her to stay with us till a respectable situation should be found for her. Her example, it seems, drew the attention of other girls of the same class. At last, within a few months, I had in my house other four who were selected from a dozen that had applied. While Jeannette taught the infants, I instructed these girls in household work, cooking, &c. One of them, of the name of Henriette Bolermes, was the daughter of respectable parents, who were dead. She had not gone very far in the paths of sin, and she manifested such an honest and faithful character that she soon gained my full confidence. The Gospel, with which she became acquainted in our house, was exceedingly blessed to her heart, so that she became a servant of Christ. She was very clever in all sorts of needle work and in household work generally. To her I entrusted the control and management of the house during my absence, when I was out nursing. My house, however, became too small for this work; but my limited means prevented me from looking out for more ample accommodation. Out of this difficulty I was helped through the liberality of a few ladies. I was enabled to hire a tolerably large house, with a large garden. While the infant-school was transferred to the garden-house, the girls were located in the main building under Henriette's supervision. Their number soon increased to ten. After having stayed a twelvemonth or so with me, they were placed as servants in respectable families. Some of them also became nurses. In this way our Heavenly Father graciously enabled me to labour for twenty years in his vineyard. At length, however, my nervous system broke down under the work. Gradually I lost my eye-sight. Medical men advised me to withdraw from the cares and the bustle of my beloved establishment, and to settle at a quiet spot in a mountain district. Jeannette, who had also grown old enough to long for a little rest, followed me to this place, which was sought out for us by our dear friend Madame Sancourt. What I feared, however, has happened. Henriette found herself unequal to the work, which was now entirely left to her care. Besides, she married an employé at one of the Government offices, who soon after the marriage was transferred to Toulon. In short, the institution was broken up soon after our departure, but I trust that, defective though it was, like all human work, it may not have been altogether in vain in the Lord."

I have seen many enchanting pieces of scenery during my journeys through Switzerland, but not one of them ever left such a deep and beneficent impression upon my mind as this story of Marie. Every year, when gliding over the beautiful Lake of Geneva, I felt that I must spend a day and refresh myself again with the sight of this truly good woman. And so I did for four years successively. But the fifth year Madame Sancourt took me to the cemetery. There was a grave, and on it was a simple slab with this inscription: "Mary hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken from her."

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

X.—THE BELIEVER'S REWARD.

RAYS of light, whether they proceed from sun, star, or candle, move in perfectly straight lines: yet so inferior are our works to God's, that the steadiest hand cannot draw a perfectly straight line; nor, with all his skill, has man ever been able to invent an instrument capable of doing a thing apparently so simple. And it would seem to be as impossible for men to keep the even line of truth between what appear conflicting doctrines: such as the decrees of God and our free will; such as election by grace and the universal offer of the gospel; such as the justifying faith of Paul and the justifying works of James. For example, the claims of faith, though not wholly denied, have been disparaged by some in order to magnify the importance of good works: while others, going to the opposite extreme, have not sufficiently insisted on these. They have not assigned to good works their proper place, nor with apostolic earnestness urged Christians to be careful to maintain them; lest they should appear to undervalue faith, and encourage sinners in the fatal error of trusting, not to the righteousness of Christ, but to works of righteousness which they themselves have done.

No such apprehensions should hinder a preacher from declaring "the whole counsel of God." Is his topic faith in the righteousness of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the lost, and only Mediator between God and man? Let him fully set forth that cardinal doctrine; abating and qualifying nothing; giving to this grace the prominence it received at the lips of Paul, when, to the jailor who had sprung into the dungeon, and fallen at his feet, to cry, O sirs! what shall I do to be saved? he replied, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. To no awakened, anxious, alarmed sinner have I any other answer. The question admits of none other. I would not limit the Holy One of Israel, nor venture to say what, in ordinary circumstances, was within, and what without the sphere of Divine power; but, looking at God in the character of a father, and judging of his feelings by my own, I cannot believe that he could have saved men otherwise than by the sacrifice of his Son. We are, as the Bible says, "shut up to Christ." So, with reverence be it spoken, in a sense was God. Had there been any other way, he would surely have chosen it. If he could, he would surely have spared his Son. Those who have studied his works know that, whether it be to roll a world through space, or only sustain an insect on the wing, God applies the exact amount of power necessary to accomplish his object; that, and no more than that. He wastes nothing; and if the works of creation afford no examples of his unnecessarily expending power or skill, how confident may we be that, in redeeming us, he did not unnecessarily shed the blood of his beloved Son; that, by no sacrifice less precious than the life which Christ offered up on Calvary could man have been saved, and righteous vengeance turned from our guilty heads. Without allowing the fear of its being abused to restrain him, or tone down his statements, the preacher is, therefore, to give Christ and the faith which receives his righteousness, their pre-eminent place. In making Jesus the centre of the whole system, in showing that there is no other name given under heaven whereby men can be saved but his, and how faith, not good works, is the way to Christ, and how Christ, not the Church or Sacraments, is the way to God, the preacher but declares in words what finds its most blest expression in the anthems and actions of the upper sanctuary. There, every harp is strung to Jesus' praise, and saints, descending from their celestial thrones, do homage for the crowns they wear by casting them at his pierced feet.

If good works, on the other hand, form the topic of discourse, the preacher is to be no less faithful in declaring the whole counsel of God respecting them. Man is not wiser than God. It is as much beyond our skill to improve the Gospel by putting things in a better or safer light, as to add beauty to a rose or lustre to the noon-day sun. Therefore, keeping nothing back, modifying and subtracting nothing, but telling the whole truth respecting them, we are to give good works the place which God himself has given them—no higher, yet no lower. And how full of honour and importance that place?—in that, though they do not justify us, they form the evidences of our justification; in that, though they do not awaken God's love to us, they are the welcome expressions of our love to him; in that, though they do not, as rendering an atonement for sin, pacify God, they please him; in that, though wrought by the power of his Spirit, and accepted through the merits of his Son, with their defects all overlooked for Jesus' sake, they shall receive a recompense in the kingdom of heaven.

Whoever, therefore, may be pouring water on a sand-bed, running their horses on a rock and ploughing there with oxen, beating the air and spending their strength for nought, giving their money for that which is not bread and their labour for that which profiteth not—it is not such as, in the words of the apostle, are "careful to maintain good works." Engaging in these, we shall reap if we faint not. No pain suffered, nor service rendered, nor work done for Christ, is lost—the very shame we bear for him shall be transformed into immortal laurels, and every tear shed like His over human sorrow, or hers who bent in penitence at his feet, shall be a pearl in the heavenly crown. The poorer we become for Christ, we shall grow the richer. The more we forget ourselves, the more will he remember us. Even a cup of cold water given to a disciple in the name of a disciple has the promise of a rich reward; while, of all the saints in the kingdom of heaven, they shall shine brightest and sing loudest and enter in fullest measure into the joys of their Lord, whose life has most resembled his. Most blessed they that tread the closest on the steps of one who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister; who spent his days going about doing good; and whose life, till it closed in a bloody death, amply fulfilled the promise of its dawn, of his earliest recorded saying, of this reply to Mary, "How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" "I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me," says St. John, "Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them."

His works often follow a good man in this world.

Let me illustrate this by an example. An extensive tract of country in one of our distant colonies was occupied many years ago by forests, where the traveller found only the scantiest means of subsistence. It was inaccessible to all but the few savages who roamed its gloomy solitudes. It is no longer so. Beautiful and fruit-bearing trees now occupy the forest glades, and, providing abundance of nutritious food, have opened up the country to the foot of civilised man, and to its savage tribes the blessed influences of the Gospel. It was thus the change was brought about, as I have read or remember the story. Long years ago, there lived there a devout man, one who had left his native land, but not, like many others, the profession of its religion behind. Animated with love to Christ, and an eager desire to save souls, he was wont to leave the settlement and penetrate these forests to carry the Gospel to their wandering tribes. Ever aiming at doing good, nor confining himself, as is the habit of some, to one way of doing it, he sought, Christlike, to benefit the bodies as well as the souls of men. So, on leaving home, he was accustomed, besides his Bible, to carry a store of the stony seeds of those trees that now bless and beautify the country; and though, exposed to perish of famine or fall by the club of the savage, he might never live to see them blossom, ever and anon, as he emerged into a sunny glade, he planted a seed, leaving it to the care of God, the dews and showers of heaven. And now, though his bones have long mouldered into dust, in trees that bear beauty in their blossoms and life in their fruit, his works, done with prayer to God and from love to man, are still following him on earth. While others, who lived to enrich themthemselves and accumulate fortunes that have sunk amid the wreck of time, are forgotten, this good man's memory, like these trees, blossoms in perennial beauty. He has his name inscribed, not on a mouldering tombstone amid emblems of decay, but on the ever-living face of nature and on the hearts of grateful generations that sit under the shadow of his piety and enjoy its fruits.

Even so by labours accomplished in the spiritual field the Christian may live after he is dead. Leaving behind them works which shall continue for ages to preserve their memory and follow them here, many through their good words, though dead, are yet speaking; through their good works, though dead, are yet working. There is no good work or word, indeed, but contains a germ of immortality, and may produce results God only has a mind to measure. Like the tiny stream which, small and shallow where it leaves its cradle, grows as it goes, till, fed by many tributaries, it at length swells into a river that, sweeping by the lands of many tribes, and, bearing the sails of many nations on its bosom, like the Amazon or Mississippi, makes its floods felt far out from shore—freshening the briny sea, good words have been spoken, and good works done that have grown from small beginnings into incalculable importance. Living through long periods of the world's history, they carry their blessed influences far beyond the land of their birth, even to the ends of the earth. In proof of this let me adduce two remarkable examples, namely, Sabbath Schools and the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Many cities claimed to be the birth-place of Homer, and, with a still more laudable ambition, England and Scotland are rivals for the honour of establishing the first Sunday-school. At the period of the Rebellion, one of the ministers of Brechin, an old cathedral town in Forfarshire, was a Mr. Blair, who left the mountain parish of Lochlee, where I write this paper, to fill that charge. He was a man who made his mark on the place and people; and though he has been dead a hundred years, they still tell stories of him as both a faithful minister of the Gospel, and a stout adherent of the house of Hanover. Tradition relates how on one occasion his courage equally astonished friend and foe. On a Sabbath day, while he was preaching, the doors of the church were violently burst open, and in marched a body of Prince Charles's men; rebels armed to the teeth with target, claymore, dirk, and gun. They ordered Blair to stop. He heeded them not, but thundered on. Whereupon, to the terror of many and agitation of the whole congregation, two officers mounted the pulpit stairs and, each laying a pistol on the cushion to enforce their orders, again they commanded him to stop. Little disposed to yield obedience to any civil authority in the things of God and within his house, and least of all to that of rebels in arms for a Popish prince, the preacher heard them as if he heard them not. He boldly went on with his discourse. They might fire away, but he would neither yield to their threats, nor own their authority. At length the provost, who was Blair's brother-in-law, dreading that they would shoot him dead on the spot, rose from his seat, which was opposite the pulpit, and bade him stop. "No," replied the intrepid preacher, as with his arms he pushed the pistols from the cushion on to the floor, "No; I would not stop though the devil and all his angels were here." Whereupon, as the story goes, the highlandmen, judging it not well, or perhaps safe to proceed to extremities with a man whom they might kill but could not conquer, gathered up their pistols, and walked off, leaving our hero in quiet possession of the field. This is the man to whom I believe those Sunday-schools which cover the Christian world like a vast network, owe their origin. The traveller whose curiosity may lead him to visit that old cathedral, less for its sake than for the old round tower that stands there the graceful monument of an older and purer faith than Popery, will find a marble tablet on the wall to the memory of Blair, where he may read that "Mr. Blair, about the year 1760, instituted a Sabbath evening school, the first it is believed that was opened in Scotland."

But whether Blair or Raikes was first inspired with the happy thought, or whether, as has not unfrequently happened in scientific discoveries, each, independently of the other, was led to the same result, in the multitudes of children Sunday-schools have been the means of saving, in the millions they are blessing throughout the Christian world, how do the good works of their founders follow them here? Living to the noblest and most enduring purposes, they indeed have left "their footprints on the sands of time." Seated on a throne which was already shaking beneath him, with a cloud darkening his royal brow, and remorse, like a worm, gnawing at his heart, King Solomon gave utterance to this melancholy soliloquy, "I made me great works—whatever mine eyes desired, I kept not from them—I withheld not my heart from any joy. Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do, and behold all was vanity and vexation of spirit. There was no profit under the sun!" With other feelings the founders of Sunday-schools bend from heaven to look on the work of their hands. As they look down from their thrones on the millions of little children gathered, bright and happy, every Sunday, into these schools, and as they listen to catch the hymns of their young voices floating up through the skies to mingle with the songs of angels, and as they see many an opening flower bathed with the dews of early grace, and transplanted from these nurseries of a stormy world to bloom out in the paradise of God, how, were it right to envy any, might the greatest of earth's great ones envy them? Blessed indeed are the dead that die in the Lord; they rest from their labours, and their works do follow them!

The British and Foreign Bible Society supplies another, and not less remarkable, example. Briefly told, this is the story of its origin. A devout Welsh minister who was accustomed to converse familiarly with his flock, meeting a little girl on a Monday morning, asked her to repeat the text of the preceeding day. She could not; and, blushing, to his surprise laid the blame on the snow that lay in heavy wreaths by the hedge-rows and deep on all the hills around. It had prevented her, as she explained, from going to a distant cottage to which she was wont to repair to learn the text from a Bible there. This simple incident led to an important inquiry. The good man found, to his grief and dismay, that many of the families around had no copy of the Word of God. As remarkable for energy as piety, he set off at once for London to get a society formed for the purpose of supplying his poor countrymen with the Scriptures. For this end he appealed to the directors of the Religious Tract Society; nor in vain. A few of these good men, one of them being William Wilberforce, quietly assembled in an obscure counting-room in one of the densest parts of the city to hear his proposal. They agreed to it; and were about to disperse when, like a sunbeam breaking from the clouds, and streaming through the dusty panes to light up the dingy room, a bright thought flashed into the mind of one of them. He rose to say what asssociates that humble counting-room with the stable of Bethlehem; and redeeming it for ever from obscurity, has made it the honoured birth-place of a society which, the glory of Britain and the world, has sent forth hundreds of millions of Bibles in hundreds of different tongues. "If a Bible society for Wales," he said, "why not a Bible society for the world?" Brief, but most pregnant question! It sounded on their ears like a voice from heaven. It was felt to be the very question He would have put, who embraced the whole world in his arms, and baptised it with his blood. Breathing his spirit, and commending itself to theirs, the proposal was at once, and cordially, assented to. Recalling more than any speech that ever dropped from mortal lips the creating fiat, Let there be light, and there was light—that blessed question, that brave proposal of Christian faith has chased away the darkness of many lands, and illumined with the knowledge of saving truth the uttermost parts of the earth. This is the greatest speech on record. Though dead, he yet speaketh who said it. Nor could any, leaving those busy presses that are throwing off Bibles by millions in many different tongues, stand by his grave without feeling that he who sleeps below was distinguished among those of whom it can be said, "their works do follow them." It is the privilege of few to achieve works of corresponding magnitude and usefulness. Such honours have not all God's saints. One star differeth from another star in glory. Yet there is not a humble cottager who is training her child for God; nor servant who, with an eye to his glory, bends to the meanest work; nor widow who, out of her poverty, casts her humble offering into his treasury; nor any, in life's obscurest lot, who are trying to do good, to help the helpless and relieve distress, to heal a wounded heart, to smooth a thorny pillow, to bring a soul to Jesus, to turn a sinner to God, to restore a backslider, or to raise the fallen, but is engaged in a work that, though it may leave no trace on earth, shall follow them through the vale of death to receive a recompense of reward.

His works always follow a good man to heaven.

Many of our countrymen leave home and, undergoing a voluntary exile, take their way to India or other distant climes. Their object is to make a fortune; and the hope that lures them on, often to a life of privations and an early death, is that they shall return to pass the evening of their days in the enjoyment of ease and affluence. According to the store people set on wealth, and show, and sumptuous living, and expensive pleasures, will this conduct be considered wise or foolish. Men may entertain different opinions on that matter, but all, with one consent, will pronounce him a fool who, after making a fortune abroad, leaves it there, to return as poor as he went away; poorer, indeed, with enfeebled health, a shattered constitution, and few friends surviving to welcome the wanderer back, and cheer his dull old age. Asking for what purpose he banished himself, toiled, and wasted his prime and manhood, people would pronounce such conduct to be arrant folly. Yet thousands whom the world esteems wise commit a greater folly: nor is there any walk of life but is thronged with still greater fools—with thousands who toil and struggle, scrape and save, rise up early and lie down late and eat the bread of sorrow, to gain what only adds to the bitterness of that inevitable hour when they must leave all behind. Naked man comes from his mother's womb, and, stripped of all his wealth and honours, naked he returns thither. What is money to the dead; or fame; or fulsome eulogies; or the pomp of a funeral which interests all but him whose cold clay it mocks with empty honours? The plaudits of the world wake no echoes in the tomb; nor can all the glittering objects which so many eagerly, and some exclusively, pursue, either add in the smallest measure to the happiness of the saved, or abate in the least degree the miseries of the lost. All the grandeur and the good things of this world must be left behind: and how do they waste life's golden hours who spend them in pursuing objects they gain but to lose, and possess but for a little to part with for ever? More free of care and sin, much happier, and not more foolish, is yonder group of laughing children, that build castles of sand within the tide mark, or, seated on a sunny bank, crown their fair brows with garlands of wild withering flowers.

The value of all works may be proved by this very simple test—will they follow us? Accompanying us out of this world, will they go with us into the next? That only is of real value to a man which he can carry with him. A touchstone that, which neither gold, nor houses, nor broad acres, nor sounding titles, nor household comforts, can stand! With ruthless hand death strips all alike; nor is it true that one dies poor, and another rich. All die equally poor, the results of death being as impartial as its pains. It is as hard to expire with kings amid silken curtains and on a bed of down, as with beggars in a barn on a pallet of straw; and indeed, I have thought that death, with its filmy eye, and restless head, and panting breath, and pinched, pallid face, looked to the full as terrible in the gilded halls of nobles as in the barest cabins of the poor. "There is one event to all," says the wise man; and the question of true importance touching the dead is not the common one, What have they left?—but this, What have they carried away?

"Blessed are they that do his commandments." Witnesses in their favour, though not the price of his, their works of faith and love and piety shall go up with them to the judgment; and there they shall have the happiness to find that, while God has forgiven all their sins—the greatest of them, he has forgotten none, even the least of their services. He who puts his people's tears into his bottle, writes their good works in his book. "A book of remembrance," the prophet says, "was written before him for them that feared the Lord and that thought upon his name; and they shall be mine, saith the Lord of Hosts, on that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him." Unanswered as some may have appeared, all the prayers they ever offered, lost as many seemed to be, all the labours they endured, and all the scorn they bore, and all the good fights they fought, and all the fidelity they showed in the cause of Christ, he shall remember and reward. The bread they cast on the waters shall return when Jesus, putting into their hands a golden harp and on their heads a shining crown, bids them welcome to the glory of the skies, saying, Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!

The prospect of this may well raise saints above the fear of death. The dread of it is instinctive, a feeling common to all men—common, as the flight of deer before the hounds, the silence of the groves when thunder peals or the hawk screams in the sky, the efforts of a poor worm to wriggle out of our way, show indeed to all living creatures. In some, no doubt, this instinct is stronger than in others. There have been bad men who could calmly confront death, sleeping like a happy child the night before their execution, and marching to the scaffold with head erect, and cheek unblanched, and step firm as his who brushes the dew from heather or flowery sward. On the other hand, some of God's people, though they had no reason to fear the issue, have shrunk from death with an inconquerable horror, and under its fear have been all their lifetime subject to bondage. Nor do such feelings always spring from a dread of the pain of dying. It is certain that a man shot through the heart or beheaded, dies before he has time to feel; and more certain still that the stroke of lightning is instantaneous, and must be painless—the victim being dead as a stone before he can see the flash which kills him; yet where the good hope through grace is conjoined with a great natural horror of death, no demonstration of that kind will tranquillise the mind amid the peals and flashes of a thunder-storm. Besides this instinctive dread, the ordinary accompaniments of death are such as, apart from the consolations of the Gospel, cast dismal shadows on the valley sin dooms all to travel. Pain is a feature common both to birth and death. It is with groans we leave a world that we enter with a cry: nor has it any sounds so terrible as a man's last gasping breaths, or sight so appalling as his struggles in the arms of death. And even when the curtain falls on the awful scene, and silence succeeds to groans, and the restless form lies in repose, and the expression of pain has passed from the pale placid face, and all is over, how do our hearts recoil from that grave amid whose darkness and corruption loved ones, whose voices we shall no more hear and whose faces we shall no more see, are mouldering into dust? This skeleton form, the dread messenger whom sin has armed with a dart and the great God sends to summon mortals to his judgment-bar, is indeed the King of Terrors.

Does a believer, or rather should a believer, then fear to die? Paul answers the question. See him there, as, longing to depart, he stretches out his wings to go, esteeming it better to be absent from the body and present with the Lord; or on yonder battle-field, where, with his foot on our last enemy and triumph in his tones, he bends down to taunt and to defy him, saying, O, Death, where is thy sting? Thanks be to God, who giveth me the victory through my Lord Jesus Christ!

Fear to die? The Apostle knew in whom he had believed. He was persuaded that neither death nor life, nor things present nor things to come, should be able to separate him from the love of God which was through Jesus Christ. He had a full assurance that the blessed Master whom he had lived, and was about to die, to serve, would receive him to his glorious rest. Never bond-slave longed for emancipation, or pining captive for green fields and home, or soldier weary of war for his discharge, or weather-beaten mariner, as he lay on the helm battling with rude seas and roaring tempests, for a quiet harbour, more than Paul for death; to depart and be with Jesus. And since it is at death the servant, having ended his task, receives his wages; the soldier, having closed his battles, obtains the crown; the pilgrim, having finished his journey, is welcomed to his Father's house, and enters into rest: how much more common were the hopes and peace and triumph of Paul, did Christians labour more diligently to make their calling and election sure. Many more might die offering in the manner of their death the greatest sermon that was ever preached, the grandest spectacle that can be seen on earth. Peace enjoyed amid such terrors and distractions is a spectacle to turn aside the steps of Moses. Here is a bush burning, yet not consumed. It was a sight worth seeing, when the young shepherd stood by the giant's vast form, with his foot planted on his neck, and mothers and maidens, conducting him from the field of a glorious victory, sang his praises to the timbrel and the dance; but it is a spectacle more glorious still to see a dying saint treading death and the devil beneath his feet, in the sublime power of faith conquering all mortal and guilty fears, calmly awaiting the hour of departure, comforting the mourners who weep around his bed, and with a placid smile bidding the world adieu. Amid such scenes faith achieves her grandest triumphs. There, the infidel has felt compelled to do her homage; and has been heard to say, on leaving the field of such a victory, May I die the death of the righteous, and may my last end be like his!

Fear to die? There is enough in the prospects which faith opens up to raise a man out of himself, and render him insensible alike to the feeling of pain and the fears of death. Even those feelings which are commonly feeble may, being roused, undergo such change and acquire such power as a mountain brook, that, ordinarily murmuring along its stony channel of little pools and tiny waterfalls, when thunders shake the heavens and roll among the hills, swells into a torrent which, dashing, roaring, foaming along its rugged course, sweeps everything before it. Look, for example, at the bird to whose protecting wings our Lord compares his own fond kindness! See how bravely, though by nature timid, she defends her helpless brood, and ruffles her feathers to spring in the face of man or beast. The maternal affection, roused by a sense of danger, takes entire possession of her heart, and imparts to it the courage of a lion. Even the love of science—a passion, if as pure, commonly as cold as a wintry sky—has overmastered the fears of death. Archimedes calmly pursued his studies in Syracuse amid the uproar of the assault; nor when a soldier, with murderous weapon and intent, burst into his apartment, asked other favour at his hand but a few more minutes to finish the problem he was engaged in solving. Even less noble and exalted passions may become equally absorbing. A Roman army once fought with such enthusiasm as to be insensible to an earthquake that rocked the ground beneath their feet; and I knew a soldier who, with the foe before him and comrades falling at his side, was raised so much above the sense of pain as never to discover that a ball from the French had shattered his wrist, till he found himself unable to fire off the musket he had levelled at their ranks.

No wonder, therefore, that the prospects of dying saints should sometimes lift them above themselves. A clear eye and a cloudless sky, his home full in view, heaven at hand, through the gate that opens to receive him Jesus seen amid the glories of his Father's throne with a crown ready to place on his servant's brows, these are sufficient to account for the comfort and courage with which many have not merely met, but welcomed their dying day—to account, without calling in miraculous agency, for what we read in old books, how some, going to martyrdom with dauntless mien and face radiant as on a marriage day, have felt no pain at the burning stake, and sung out their life amid the roar of fire. Let a dying man enjoy a clear view of his interest in Christ, and an unclouded prospect of the rest and reward that remaineth for His people, and the last should be the happiest hours of his life. Of such a life it may well be said, "the end is better than the beginning." Thus one of our Scottish martyrs, standing on the ladder from which they were to throw him off, assured the weeping spectators that he had never gone up to his pulpit to preach with so little fear as he had mounted that ladder to die—to him it was a perch from which his spirit, wearied of a world full of sin and sorrows, was spreading out its joyful wings for the flight to heaven. Another, addressing his weeping mother and sisters, who had entered his cell for a last visit on the morning of his execution, said, "Let us be glad and rejoice, for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready. Could I have ever thought that the fear of suffering and death could be so taken from me. Lord!" he exclaimed, "Thou hast brought me within two hours of eternity, and this is no matter of terror to me more than if I rose to go to lie down on a bed of roses: now that I am so near the end of time, I desire to bless the Lord: death is to me as a bed to the weary! Yonder," he remarked on hearing the drums beat for his execution, "yonder is my welcome call to the marriage. The Bridegroom is coming. I am ready!" Assured, as he said, by God of his salvation, with these sublime words he left the world to pass within the veil—"Farewell, beloved fellow-sufferers and followers of the Lamb. Farewell, night-wanderings for Christ and all sublunary things. Farewell, conflicts with a body of sin and death. Welcome, scaffold for precious Christ. Welcome, heavenly Jerusalem. Welcome, innumerable company of angels. Welcome, crown of glory. Welcome, above all, thou blessed Trinity and one God. O Eternal One, I commit my soul unto thy eternal rest." What a glorious sunset of a stormy day? What a commentary that scene on these grand words of Paul—"DEATH IS SWALLOWED UP IN VICTORY. O DEATH, WHERE IS THY STING? O GRAVE, WHERE IS THY VICTORY? THE STING OF DEATH IS SIN: AND THE STRENGTH OF SIN IS THE LAW. BUT THANKS BE TO GOD, WHICH GIVETH US THE VICTORY THROUGH OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST. THEREFORE, MY BELOVED BRETHREN, BE YE STEDFAST, IMMOVABLE, ALWAYS ABOUNDING IN THE WORK OF THE LORD, FORASMUCH AS YE KNOW THAT YOUR LABOUR IS NOT IN VAIN IN THE LORD."

LAZARUS.

IT is natural that a profound interest should cling to Lazarus. He alone went among the shadows of death, and passed behind the grave, and came back to take his place among men. The greatest miracle on record was wrought upon him. He was the innocent cause of Christ's arrest. He was Christ's friend, singled out from the rest, as much as Mary the Lord's mother or John the beloved. And thus many interests meet in him—the mystery of the unseen world, of which, if he dared, he could speak; the mystery of that friendship by which Jesus laid hold of him, and which was firm and tender enough to bring the Saviour to tears; the mystery of that place allotted to him in the life of Christ, by which he became linked with the close of its terrible drama, and was the proximate cause of the death of Him that loved him; and the mystery of a stupendous miracle, in which the kingdom of death was visibly vanquished and broken. And yet there is this singular feature of his story—that there is scarcely a man of whom we could be told less. His story occupies an entire chapter—the twentieth part of one Gospel; and elsewhere he is at least once introduced: but all we know of him seems to be that he was sick and died. The details of the Magdalen's life are slight; yet there are incidents full of significance, and the story is carried on from point to point. But Lazarus seems introduced simply for the miracle's sake, and beyond what is necessary to understand that, we learn nothing of the man, nothing of his personal history, meet with him at the supreme moment when sickness passes into death, and part from him at the supreme moment when the tomb yields him back to life. He is overshadowed by wonder. He stands out for a moment with a marvellous distinctness, and disappears in awe. A veil seems purposely flung over him. He abides and keeps his place in history, not by his own personality, but as a trophy of the power of God—one more example, if more were needed, of the height of that solitary Life that was then in the world; so high above all others that beside it even the best of men recedes into a subordinate place, and becomes only an illustration of Him. This is the main impression, and it is one which stamps Jesus of Nazareth with a divine majesty—which lifts Him above the mere rabbi, and centre of a group, and great man—which shows that not only men dwarf beside his mystic grandeur—for that would be true enough of any hero—but that when they come near Him all the play and power and profound interest of their own lives are of value only as they set Him forth, that the most solemn and tragic passages of their own history were but illustrations to Him, and of which I will only say, in passing, that it is an idea which, if Jesus were no more than the greatest of mankind, would be simply blasphemous,—which the wildest hero-worship would not venture to have conceived. Yet there is no absorption by Jesus of others into himself; beside Him the part they play may seem little, but their characters remain distinct, nay, come out by his illumination into more vivid distinctness. The traits we have of Lazarus, though subordinate to the character of Christ, abundantly reveal him. There is no confused blending of his character with another. The veil that is flung over him repels curiosity, yet itdoes not hide what he was.

I.

Half-an-hour's walk from Jerusalem by the gate over the brow of Olivet lay the little village of Bethany—so near that, in our western cities, it would have been a suburb, yet, lying among its olive-gardens beyond the din of the streets and out of sight, it became a favourite resort of the Lord. One house opened its friendly doors to Him who often had not where to lay his head; one family received Him as its special friend. Many a night He spent under this hospitable roof; many an evening He withdrew from the staring crowd and the weary round of questions, and the incessant strain of watching against scribes and priests, and refreshed Himself with the country quiet and love of this faithful household. Every one in the village knew Him, and every one knew Him as their friend. The household, as we find it, consisted of a brother and two sisters. We know more of the women, who seem to have been older, and Lazarus is introduced simply as their brother; but of their previous history we know nothing. Many circumstances show that they were people of station: the consideration paid to them in the village, the friends they had among the Pharisees, their entertainments, the costly box with which Mary anointed the Saviour, their ownership of a family burying-place. Lazarus was apparently the youngest. We may pass over the ingenious guesses by which his father has been identified with Simon the leper, and he himself with the rich young man who went away sorrowful from Christ. He was probably wealthy, and belonged to the party of Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea; and shared its aspirations. We know nothing decisive as to his character, as it is not directly described; there is no special trait that throws light upon it; we see it and read it in the opinion of others. Characters of that kind are often rarely beautiful; they produce the profoundest impression on those who know them, but they do not bear description—by some subtle law they elude portraiture. The enthusiasm they produce cannot be communicated beyond the circle of intimate friends. There are no special qualities to distinguish them. The impression they make can only be understood by knowing them. And we know Lazarus by the respect of his friends, by the touching grief of his sisters, by the love of Jesus. We see him in these—we do not otherwise know him—as a mirror may reflect with perfect clearness objects that do not otherwise meet the eye. They are a tribute paid to worth, to a winning, affectionate, and upright character. One of them especially reveals much. Besides Lazarus, there are but two men and two women whom Jesus is said to have loved: the young Ruler and John the Apostle, Martha and Mary. Something of what we know of them we may expect to find in him. Ingenuousness, high aims, moral earnestness, an unsatisfied yearning for rest, characterized the ruler. Insight, warm generous feelings, an abounding love, a deep passionate trust, characterized the Apostle. In Paul we have both combined, and have besides a man of the class to which Lazarus probably belonged. Like him, his days may have been > "spent

> In blameless peace and study of our law,
> And frequent prayers: and all our Rabbis taught
> Who sat in Moses' seat, I learnt and did."

An earnest meditative priest-spirit, a temper like his sister Mary, would but harmonize with what is told us of his life. There must have been a moral beauty and simplicity of character to draw to him the esteem and love of Christ. And it was more even than esteem, for there was a natural affection, a friend's love, a drawing of heart to heart; and that is not readily conceivable with one who had plunged deeply into the sins of the world, or on whom Christ had merely wrought some marvellous work. Silently, in the repose of that gentle house, we may conceive Christ's words and his Divine aspect sinking into the young Pharisee's heart, and how at last He became to him not merely friend but teacher and Messiah. Silently, we may conceive the change wrought out in spite of the murmurs and disdain of his companions, much ridicule of young Scribes, and scoffing of Sadducees, and narrow-minded orthodox denunciations of new ways and anxious admonitions of venerable aged men who clung to the traditions of the fathers. And when, with self-surrender of his simple ardent nature, he came to Christ, we may barely conceive of the tie which bound them, a friendship so exquisitely pure, a confidence and reliance that in the stronger are so exquisitely touching.

If anything could realize to men the true and perfect humanity of Christ, it would be such a story as this. We have here one who feels with us; who does not place Himself above the needs of a human life; who, having showed Himself with the deep affection of a man, now in manhood shows the yearning and delight of friendship. The sense of wonder, of mystery, of Divine awe, spring up naturally about Him, they veil Him with an infinite majesty; but this is a touch of real life that makes the whole world kin, that prevents Him ascending from our thoughts in the clouds of his glory, and binds Him to us by common and familiar and most precious ties. For not only is Lazarus represented as claiming the friendship of Jesus, but Jesus as claiming his; nor are we led so much to think of friendly acts, as of the inner bond of friendship and its hidden flow of fellowship.

Such friendship as that was perhaps only possible while Christ was on earth. It needed the circumstances of his life and his visible presence. But if it would be impossible to reproduce it—if it would be a shallow view of Christ to see Him only in the exact form of his human ministry—there are those who may find in Him what Lazarus found; those to whom He reveals himself, as one friend unbosoms his heart to another; who see Him less in official relations and sacrificial act than in personal communion; who, knowing Him as their Saviour and adoring Him as their God, approach Him by the strength of his sympathy; who recognise in Him, though with mystery, the like power of attraction; and feel to Him the like drawing of the heart that friends have ever felt to friends. The qualities of that nature have lost nothing since they laid hold of Lazarus; nor are they less conspicuous, but more; nor do they fail to meet the soul as they met his, and that in its loftiest and truest moments. In this sense also is Jesus lifted up that He may draw men unto Him. In this sense we may not always recognise Him. We may be blinded by passion, or transient lust, or self-interest, or the god of this world. In the busy march that modern life requires, we may have left ourselves no leisure to think of other friends than those that gather round us and march with us. But that Friend is there, and He may be found, aside from the stir, in thoughtful moments, by thoughtful natures. Those who live in quiet Bethanys may know Him best, and this friendship may grow up with all the strength of meditative earnestness. Yet, if it is not given to every man to be a Lazarus or a John, nor to every woman to be a Mary, it is given to every Christian to have a friend in Jesus. He himself called the disciples his friends, and He is set out as the friend that sticketh closer than a brother. There are other relations that we bear to Jesus than between a Redeemer and the redeemed. On the way to our redemption He took up our humanity and allied us, as men, to Himself; and such ties as men recognise among themselves, they find established between them and Him. We not only come to Him with thanksgiving, loyalty, and obedience, but for fellowship. The friend whom we consult in some family emergency, or with whom we take sweet counsel, on whom we fall back for succour, to whom we hasten for sympathy, with whom we share our thoughts, on whose love we count—it is Jesus. Whatever a friend can do, He is open to do. No one else can come so near, can give us such confidence in his wisdom and judgment, can so penetrate through our perplexities; no one else will estimate us with the same righteous tolerance; with no one else can there be the same frank unreserved expression of thought, the same opening of a troubled and hesitating heart. Nothing that affects us is indifferent to Him; He watches with the keenest interest our tastes and pursuits; his perception of our position is unerringly accurate, and quick, and delicate. Lack of sympathy, dread of ridicule, misgiving about whether or not we shall be understood, are enough to make us keep our counsel and fight our way alone. Some change of expression, some unwitting discord with our mood, some unskilfulness in taking up our meaning, have often crushed back the cry or story that was springing to our lips. A friend may be very genuine, yet not very sensitive; ready with his help, yet clumsy; honest and warm-hearted, but not able to comprehend our difficulties; and by what he is not, he leaves us—we can all tell how sadly—to ourselves. The friendship of Christ is in this and in every way perfect. Prayer will bring the Friend at any moment to our side. Nay, He seems to be marching with us through our life, so exact is his knowledge of our circumstances, and so often has He helped us before we had sought Him. And to have Jesus, means that dream of a perfect friend that haunts us in the days of our youth come true; that ideal, that with cooler thought and more wisdom we learn to think impossible, more than fulfilled: it means this, and over and above, all that is deep and divine in the Son of God, all that is peculiar in the Sacrifice of the Cross to those for whom it was offered. Lazarus must have claimed it by faith, and claimed it with a peculiar energy and self-surrender. It is an exquisite picture that John leaves on our minds: the calm days of intimate communion in the little hamlet; converse on the law and the prophets till the heart burned within; a revelation of the mind, and all the graciousness of Jesus, where he was free from restraint and all the fretting of a crowd; his sympathy with the movements of the household and the young Jew, who kindles into interest, yields himself up in simple and entire trust, and leans upon his Divine friend, is the companion of his walks, sits with Him under the shade of the fig-tree in the court or on the house-top while the sun goes down and glows upon Jerusalem, hears from his own lips of his wonderful plan, shares his sorrow and indignation, insensibly comforts and cheers Him, follows Him with wistful sympathy, or enters into his thoughts with a ready spirit, even when they baffle his comprehension.

II.

The Gospel introduces Lazarus as the known and recognised friend of Jesus. With characteristic subordination of all to Him, it takes up the story where we would naturally leave it. To John the life of Lazarus is of no importance save in its relation to Christ, and all we learn of it is by the light flung from some chance word in the narrative, or some expression wrung by grief from a group of mourners. The first that we hear of the friend of Jesus is that he was sick and died. His life was probably uneventful, and flowed away as hundreds of lives do, without notice, or break of its smooth current.

Then the sharp quick fever came and smote him down. It seemed like yesterday that Jesus had been with them on his way to Jerusalem; that they had sat at his feet, and Martha had served Him. A sudden popular tumult that threatened him in the streets of the capital drove him from it to the fords of the Jordan, and thus He remained among the memories that clung to the scene of John's baptism. He was within reach, but the fever makes swift work, and before the messenger had brought Him news that Lazarus was sick, the two sisters had watched their brother die. We can fancy the hush and awe of that stricken home, the desolate lonely grief, the orphans left more helpless than ever, the interment anxiously hurried over, and then the reaction when there was no more to do, and the mind took in all that had occurred, and the sorrow made its way leisurely by every road to their heart. Careful watching by the bed, jealous hungry love, skill of physicians, their own helplessness, had availed nothing. Jesus loved him and was his friend—that also had availed nothing. They seem at first not to have realised that he could die. Jesus would hasten to them, and surely in his presence death could not touch their brother. Those who have watched the dying can tell best how they may have watched and listened, turned from the face to watch the nearest point of road, and from the road back to find the sick man weaker, counted the minutes, begged the physicians for delay, denied to themselves that their brother was worse, and then visibly seen that he was sinking. Now their own life seemed to tremble in the balance of his, and yet the fever stole on by hours and minutes, and the pulse grew fainter, and all the last flickering hopes went out. Lazarus was dead, and there was no sign of Jesus. The sorrow spread through the village, neighbours gossiped kindly and sadly over the family; they may have whispered it was a judgment, but their whispers would run into praise of the unripe life and stories of the boy that had grown up among them: friends and kindred came from the city with their sympathy and common-places; the bier was got ready and they laid him sorrowfully in the tomb, and set the stone against it, and things seemed to go on as before, only Lazarus was dead, and there was no sign of Jesus. Jesus had never left the Jordan. He knew more than the messenger, for He knew that Lazarus' sickness was over; yet He did not remain, because He knew it would be of no use. He could have saved his friend. He could have healed him by a word. It was not lack of sympathy with human sorrow, nor indifference to human affection. The delay was deliberate and with a purpose, into which everything about Him was made to work. A greater miracle was to be wrought than healing. The glory of God was to be seen. Jesus was to advance to his death by the brightest splendour of his power. Yet while He lingered by the fords of the Jordan, the sisters' hearts were sinking, as each weary day crept after the other, and left them to the same disappointment.

This friend of Jesus had no immunity from sickness and death; and though Jesus loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus, they had their own share of trial. The evangelist lingers over the family sorrow till we feel how deep and terrible it was—till it paints itself before us like pictures on the wall: the anxious faces, the dead rigid body, the bitter tears, the mourners, and the vacant joyless chambers; there is no mistaking its intensity, there is no misreading its lesson. It is of the nature of the chequered human life to be pierced with sorrow. Jesus did not exempt himself. He does not exempt his friends. We must take the world as we find it, its grief and joy together; and as the world is, we cannot have the one without the other. Strip the trials off our earthly life, and we become unearthly; they are only the shadows of its blessings. When men point to a Christian overwhelmed by affliction, and hint that after all he has gained nothing by his faith, they make a mistake. That was a gain he never sought and never was promised. He was distinctly told that he would be left in the world and not taken out of it; that his life would be exposed to entanglement, his means to embarrassment, his body to disease. It is a weary task, no doubt, to which we are drawn, and we see the innocent lost and stricken down, and we feel that we can hate the sin that has spread its toils over all that men loved and valued; but a way out of the tangle we cannot find, till death finds it for us. And if it were possible to separate our human life from the infinite thread of circumstances that bind it to the rest—certainly a miracle of the vastest kind—it would not be worth the having; denuded of pain but also of pleasure, without sorrow and without the bliss that makes sorrow deep, unrent by bitter partings and not re-blessed by the joy of union—a vacant and negative and selfish existence, that would be harder to bear than all the crush of trial.

And so when Christians shrink from the heavier blows of life, and think if Jesus had been there it had not come: the presence of sorrow does not argue the absence of Christ, or that his love has cooled, or that He would needs interfere to spare a life, no matter how dear, or how dependent we are on it. It argues that we are in this world, and bound up with its misery, and that unless we pass out of this world we cannot escape its mutability and pain. And this chapter argues that lives may be stricken down, and loves severed, and the happiest homes darkened, while the sufferers are dear to Jesus, and He watches them and knows that they suffer. Let us keep this well in mind, so that in the day of our trial we may not shirk it, but meet it with faith, and grace, and strength, look it in the face, and look it down.

And there is this also, of which Lazarus' death speaks to us. At Bethany we look over the field of human life; at the foot of Jordan we are let look into the mystery of the Divine procedure—that is, we have the same incidents, as they are seen by men and as they are seen by God. The two sisters watching the precious hours slip away wonder that Christ delays; and through the miserable day of the interment, and the lonely days after, they wonder on. To them it is simply unaccountable delay, by which every hope is destroyed, and their agony prolonged. Jesus does not come—gives no reason—sends no message. They know precisely how long the journey will take; they have probably heard that there is no impediment to it; they have always believed that love made haste. We see just what they saw of trial; like them, we feel how it presses us at the time, and do not look beyond. We have asked for help; we have sent our embassy of prayer, and the trial crushes on—crushes the heart and the spirit, crushes the health. What we are apt to think is, that misfortune has been added to sorrow, that we are simply plunging down from depth to depth of trial. Looking at life, it is not possible to discover more. But in Christ's words we have glimpses into the Divine procedure. What at Bethany bred only woe and wonder was really the necessary step to a great work and favour of God. It was by the delay that that work was rendered possible. Behind that mystery of silence, beyond the woe and wonder of men, Jesus was disposing events to a most gracious end. Even to the disciples that were about Him He let fall only a slow hint or two,—very pregnant to those who had ears to hear, unintelligible to those who had not. But those words, as we interpret them by the events that followed, recall enough to us. They are like broken lights falling on the fields through a clouded autumn sky, when at a hundred points the shafts of light shoot down upon the little nooks of corn and kindle them into gold. They light up for us the field of the work of God. The delay may be only of wisdom or of love, or it may be to indicate God's wisdom and glory. It was for God's glory here; yet it comprehends the boon that Martha would have asked had she dared, and the spiritual gain of her brother. Though it should be only for God, let us be content. There are higher ends to serve than our happiness. But it may be for our sakes. While we look at the things that are seen, let us not forget the things that are not seen.

III.

Lazarus now dead, there would seem so much less interest in Bethany. The strain of suspense is over, and every one has accepted the logic of facts. But this history of Lazarus is so constructed, that our interest in him begins with his last sickness, and increases after his funeral. Dropping mysterious hints of sleep and waking, of a death that yet was not death, of a crisis of faith, Jesus advanced from the Jordan. He said plainly, "Lazarus is dead;" yet He spoke of the dead man as living: "Let us go to him." And when he reached the village, it was towards the grave that he turned, and not towards the house. It was apparently by some watchers at the grave that the news of his coming was brought to Martha. It was in the neighbourhood of the grave that they learnt it was the fourth day since the burial. It was to that quiet outskirt, so sad and dear to her now, that Martha hastily went out to meet Him. The words that sprang to her lips came all the more naturally from the associations of the place. The fields and trees of that Jericho road recalled to her the happiest days we have: the merry children that knew no care, and plucked the spring flowers, and watched the reapers tie the sheaves. One of these children lay still, below the flowers and the bearded wheat, and would lie there till the last day. The grave was scarcely closed. That funeral procession would have been a hideous dream, but for that weary longing at her heart

> "for the touch of a vanished hand,
> And the sound of a voice that is still."

Quivering yet to the wrench and agony of death, she met here, on familiar and now sacred ground, the dearest friend he had. The brother was gone from them both. That was her first thought; and then sprang out of these solemn memories that wondrous dialogue that John records of death and resurrection, of that day and the last day, and out of it again the sublime but as yet visionary thought of One who was Himself life and resurrection, and who stood before her as the friend of Lazarus and the Son of God. Awe-stricken, though not comprehending the revelation that she heard; comforted by words that she vaguely felt rather than understood, Martha hurried back for her sister. Mary, more fixed and absorbed in grief, and taking little part in the home things, had heard nothing of the Master's coming. She sat still in the house, and many friends sat with her to comfort her—a comfort of ceremony and politeness that she could have spared. The heart in deep trouble yearns to be alone; or if a friend will come it must be the friend we choose, and not the mere visitor of courtesy, with vapid and worn-out common-place and religious maxims that are run over by rote. Shrunk into unbroken silence, and scarce conscious of the consolation busily intruded, Mary started at the secret message, and rose up quickly to find Jesus. It was the way to the grave, and the group of friends followed, saying, "She goeth to the grave to weep there." She too felt the thrill of seeing the face that was most linked with his, she cannot resist the flood of strong pent-up thoughts, and breaks down in passionate tears. The mourners catch the infectious weeping. There is not a dry eye in the group. The piteous sobs pierced to the heart of Jesus. Here is the fruit of that sin that marred his world—the care it has brought upon his creatures. It is thus it wastes and destroys, poisons human life, and drains it of enjoyment. It is not a group, but a world of mourners that He sees. It is not the sobbing of a few women that He hears, but the wail that rises from every land. Sin confronts Him armed with death and the grave, rich with the spoil of souls. There is the enemy that He has come to destroy, and He rises up against it with a fixed and holy indignation, groaning in spirit, troubled. He, too, thrills with sympathy. If Mary weeps for a brother, He weeps for a friend.

They cluster round the grave. And now Jesus assumes his true place. He comes, as Calvin says, not as a spectator, but as a hero. He is not there by the sad feeling that draws us to the graveyard. The rest were there only to weep; Jesus is there to conquer. Every word becomes a command. Yet in the energy of that decisive moment, everything is done in order. There is no superfluous energy. It is God's way to work by human means wherever they will answer. He supplements; He does not supersede. He does not order the stone to fall from its place: the bystanders may take it away. Martha is perplexed. The face will be changed now. She dreads the shock. She shrinks from penetrating into the death-chamber. With a gentle and kindly rebuke, Jesus passes on. They see Him lift up his eyes; they hear Him pray to his Father. Then the clear majestic words burst upon the startled crowd, "Lazarus, come forth!" And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes. What grouping round that rock-hewn vault! The two sisters worn with grief, sorrowing with a dull heavy sorrow, perplexed with the statement of Christ, watching, half wondering, half in doubt, anxious that whatever it was, it was all over. The crowd of friends, swelled by the stragglers of the village, arrested by the common grief; mere spectators, however, leisurely noting every change of expression, curiously scanning the Master, whispering their own conclusions; the broken group of the disciples, troubled with the earnestness of the situation, looking on the Pharisees that had come out from Jerusalem, and remembering that they had said, "We will also die with Thee;" baffled by the words of Christ, yet with vague presentiment of what He meant, as they heard his words to Martha and his prayer to God. And in the centre Jesus himself, fronting those dread but invisible foes He had come into the world to conquer; all that was human in Him touched by irrepressible emotion, even to tears, all that was divine flashing out in his majestic and victorious words. And the dead man, as he moved feebly and uncertainly out, entangled and ghastly with the cerements of the tomb, wonderingly gazing on Him whose voice had penetrated into the eternal shades, and with no sign of corruption.

What various effects on those bystanders! "A hundred voices broke forth in cries of amazement, a hundred hands were stretched forth to the everlasting heavens, hundreds sank down upon their knees, hundreds smote upon their breasts, hundreds stood as if petrified." That a notable miracle had been wrought there was no denying, it was wrought in open day, before a crowd gathered together by accident, yet embracing people of station and enemies of Christ, on a man perfectly well known, loved and honoured, a member of an ancient family. Even in modern times, Spinoza is reported to have said that if he could be convinced of the reality of the resurrection of Lazarus, he would dash to pieces his entire system and embrace without reluctance the ordinary faith of the Christian. If that be the effect produced by the bare and scant recital at an interval of seventeen centuries, and upon one of the acutest of men, what must it have been upon those who stood by and saw each incident, and followed the risen man home! The Pharisees were alive to their danger. A miracle like this happening in what was almost a suburb of the Holy City, and attended by so many involuntary witnesses, would be spread about with inconceivable rapidity. From that time the fate of Jesus was sealed. The highest act of his friendship was to cost Him his life, and Lazarus was to be the unwilling but immediate cause of the crucifixion of his Saviour. So even with Him the threads of human life are twisted together until God unravel them.

But there were those who felt only joy.

> "From every house the neighbours met,
> The streets were filled with joyful sound;
> A solemn gladness even crowned
> The purple brow of Olivet."

W. F. Stevenson.

A VISIT TO THE CHRISTIANS OF ELBA.

FIRST OF TWO PAPERS.

"A broken vessel," damaged by the wear and tear of life, I fled for refuge in the fall of the year to the balmy shores of the Mediterranean. How much the loneliness of exile, and the weariness of sickness were relieved by the untiring care of the most unselfish and Christian family I have ever met with, I may not say. Suffice it, that to Mr. and Mrs. W—— I owe more, under God, than to the marvellous climate of Cannes; so that through them the land has become enshrined among my dearest and most grateful memories.

As soon as in the present spring the swallow was twittering its first song under my window, I rose to depart, heart-sad in departure, to join a friend at Nice on a visit to Elba—the seat of empire for a few brief days of a man whose shadow once darkened the world, and whose whisper shook the nations with affright.

In that lone isle, so interesting from this incident, and known besides only by name to the world, a few trembling fishermen had listened in secret, and by stealth, to the Word of God, and by it had become banded into brotherhood, in spite of the fiery wave of persecution which had surged against their homes.

To see this marvel of our laggard days, to see men who had honesty and courage to sacrifice interest to conscience, and mammon to Christ, was the motive that was speeding on my friend to their shores, as well as to bid the trembling knees wax strong, and give the right-hand of fellowship to men who were as sheep among devouring wolves.

It was to associate me with such a mission that my friend drew me to his side, and with the same view I invite the readers to become our companions in travel.

Assuming then the pilgrim's staff on the summons of my friend, I bent my way along the crescent Golfe de Juan, whose nearer shores, everywhere blest by the touch of fertility, rise terrace beyond terrace upwards, till craggy rocks and savage mountains contrast in wildest grandeur with the sloping paradise below.

I paused—and who does not pause entranced on reaching the high ground over Antibos to take in the fairy show that circles round by Nice to where the distant bluff of Bordighera is shadowed out in faint relief against the liquid sky! What varied beauty bursts on the ravished sight! Cities and towns; villas and castles; headland beyond headland crowned with lighthouses to guide the wandering vessel into sheltering harbours; hills covered with evergreen foliage, or gay garden-terraces undulate above. Upward the eye still ranges, till dark mountain forms boulder up the barrier Alps, peak above peak, and ridge beyond ridge, till their virgin snows sparkle in the face of heaven. One could gaze for ever; so I felt, till the secret whisper reached my heart, "What dost thou here? Arise and depart, for this is not thy rest." So I sprang to my feet, nor lingered more till I grasped my friend's hand in Nice. What a change I saw in all around me there!

"In happier days and calmer hours"

I had known Nice as a modest resting-place, where one might breathe from the harass of life amid the hush and sublimity of nature. Now it lay before me a meretricious Paris. Happily I had little time to compare the present with the past. We did but linger to greet two ladies, whose heart was in our work, and whose praise should be in all the churches, ere we committed ourselves, Providence our guide, to the purpose of our journey.

I, my friend, and his nephew, embarked the following morning on board the "Espresso" for Genoa. Our passengers were supposed to be all on board; the hour of starting past, and the boiler, roaring out its volumes and screaming in fitful passion, seemed to be bursting with impatience, and yet our moorings held us immovable to the shore. The riddle was soon solved. I saw at the end of the pier a bevy of ladies, amid a chaos of boxes, leisurely arranging their method of departure, ere they condescended to become our companions in travel. The courteous captain only smiled and bowed when these gentle loiterers stept finally on board. After battling with the boatmen, and assuring themselves leisurely of the safe delivery of all the many odds and ends of their travelling gear, they allowed the vessel to sway from the port and launch into the deep. It is needless to say that our long-expected new-comers were daughters of Albion—

"Six jolly souls, and all agog,
To dash through thick and thin"—

six unprotected females, accoutred to the teeth with modern appliances for woman's independent, adventurous travel. They needed neither man-servant nor maid-servant. They were themselves prepared for all, and equal to every fate. One unrecognised courtesy on my part, when the motion of the vessel was quickening disturbing emotions in their gentle breasts, closed further approach; and so for the rest of the journey we exchanged no word, though sprung from the same island home. They occasionally crossed our path as we journeyed on. My last sight was of the eldest battling manfully her way through the excited railway throng at Pisa; so that, unless in the meantime shot down by some lawless brigand-band, or borne to some mountain cave to grace a bandit's lair, I have good hope they may reach woman's only proper sphere at last—home and its duties.

Our passengers were a medley of all nations, crowding for interest, pleasure, or duty, to fair Italy. Heaps upon heaps of baggage and merchandise cumbered the decks, showing what an active hold commerce had already taken of a nation which but yesterday was unknown to the world. As I looked up I saw its young flag fluttering against the deep blue sky in all the joyousness of fresh, untried life. Around us lay the azure sea, glassy and still, as though the breath of tempest had never ruffled its beauty. But what a coast burst upon us as our keel clove onward through the sparkling waves! From Cape Roux behind, tracing its romantic crags against a sky unshaded by a cloud, onward to Noli, descending with its barrier-headland into the sea, beauty and grandeur unfolded their charms in very wantonness of hue and form. Picturesque towns lay fringing the blue sea between sheltering promontories. Perched on high on wooded knolls, or crouching under precipitous rocks, hamlets and villages lay nestled round shining spires, and looking down secure upon the world of waters. And far above all that bears the form or stamp of breathing life, there where the eagle builds its nest, amid clouds and mists, crags and waterfalls, you faintly descry the white hermitage or convent, those fancied abodes of peace, where men forswear the struggles and duties of life to gain an indolent access to heaven. Over and above all tower those buttresses of the skies, the thunder-riven Alps, sparkling in eternal glaciers and snows. But—

"Who can paint like Nature?
Can the imagination boast hues like hers?"

He who would know the varied and matchless beauties of the Riviera must come and see, and then confess, while rapture swells his heart, that "Manifold, O Lord, are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all! The earth is full of thy riches."

We put into Porto San Maurizio for passengers and merchandize. The appearance of the town from the sea is charming; its houses, bright and fair, rise in terraces up the steep sides of a Mamelon-cape, overhanging a well protected port. Here lay several ships of burthen, so that as this is moreover the halting-place for steamers between Nice and Genoa, one would conclude it to be an important outlet for inland traffic. A number of boats lay scattered about, awaiting our arrival, full of living freight and cargo, for our already too heavily-burthened vessel. In an instant all was bustle and confusion, boats driving against one another, to the terror of their passengers, —men shouting and screaming above the din of the escaping steam. Many a ludicrous scene occurred in the general anxiety, as the boats neared the ship, to secure their luggage and clutch the rope by the ladder. Tossed and tumbled about, one over the other, all were alarmed, and some were angry, but each too anxious for life and his household gods to dispute in earnest with his fellow. With all "it was an agony, but now forgot" the moment their foot stood firm on the welcome deck. As I hung over the ship's side, sharing in the general excitement, I descried among the struggling boats a young Englishman with his youthful bride and her maid. He was anxious as the rest, not, however for any part of his triple self, but for a gun-case, which, slanting along the gunwale as the boat heaved and lurched, was slipping from his spasmodic grasp into the sea. His face was most ludicrous, as, half sad, half comical, he watched his escaping treasure. "But what," said I to myself, "can induce an Englishman to make this his point of embarkation?" But who ever found an Englishman following a beaten track, or acting as other people do? He has license for any peculiarity, the odder the better. And so I welcomed his honest Saxon face on board. His wife sat, as English wives only can, motionless, silent, and apart. Her maid was English too, only speaking when spoken to, obeying (but in her own time and way) when bidden, and never expecting word or look of consideration or sympathy from her mistress—at least, before others. Her master, whose wits, I judged, were generally all astray, seemed suddenly bewildered on discovering that he had left something he valued behind him in the boat.

He began running first one way, then another, now gesticulating and shouting to the boatmen drifting away in the wake of the vessel, and now appealing to the captain just as the word "Avanti" (forward) dropped from his lips, and the obedient paddles were already beating the waters aside. He could make use, however, of what is always an Englishman's consolation in trouble. He could grumble and complain. "The Italian boatmen were all knaves without exception, and these the worst of all; they had tried to cheat him in the fare, and failing in that, had now secured their end by robbery. The captain was the most unobliging of all his craft, or he would even now put back, that he might recover his property and bring the knaves to reason. However, he would have his revenge. Three of his friends were on their way to embark at the same port, he would direct them now to another channel, so that the 'administration' should have no benefit from them. It would serve them right to show them up in the Times, it would." I approached him with condolence and counsel. His loss, however, was too great for either. And what was this terrible loss, that had shaken the whole man from his equanimity, and placed him beyond sympathy? "Tell it not in Gath!" reader, it was a small collection of ferns! But our vessel is now on her way, and so we must leave him in his grief to "Time the comforter." This was, however, the severest moment of his trial, for just then the wretched boatmen were shaking his treasure against the sky in mocking triumph.

Clearing the point of Noli, we stretched across the gulf for Genoa. As the coast bayed inward from us it lost nothing of its matchless charms. Continuous towns, little white nests of human life, still chequered the shores, and mountains rose high above to where Alps on Alps closed at last the passage of the skies. It is usual to say that the granduer of the Corniche terminates at Mentone. By road perhaps this is true, but sailing along the shore, where the broader foreground gives greater breadth and depth to the landscape, you find scenes continually opening, as grand as any that enraptures the land-traveller between Nice and Mentone. But when, out at sea, midway between Noli and Genoa, the eye ranges round to Porto Fino, comparison there is none. The lower shores nestle found the dark blue sea the picture of fairest beauty, while over all crowd mountain-forms sublime, Alps and Appenines, like the waves of an ocean storm against the dark-blue heaven.

But on with the boat! Alas! unfavouring winds arise, and the scanty brushwood fuel is unequal to the heavy draught of our vessel, labouring now through rebellious waves. The coast is thought of no more, as the shades of evening close around, and the long promised "haven, where we would be," is scarcely yet in sight. The poor captain, teased by the continual cry of, "When shall we be there?" points to the lighthouse glimmering in the far distance, and has only one response for all, "Eccolo, Signor! Abbia pazienza!" ("There it is, sir; have patience"). We gained the port at last, but too late to see the pride of place of Genoa la Superba, one of the most glorious sights imaginable, when you enter from the sea by daylight. However, though we distinguished nothing of the forms and hues of things, it was a wondrous sight even then, as we approached the modern Tyre. There lay the gay city, rising from a crowded shore up the steep sides of hills, and covering them for miles with streets, convents, palaces, and villas, which, lighted up at that hour, and mingled with the star-spangled sky above, seemed like a celestial city—a realised abode of man at last in intercourse with Heaven. Alas! that daylight should dissipate your dreams, for then you enter at least into a part of her own proverb, that Genoa is "un paese senz' alberi ed uomini senza fede" (a country without trees and men without honour).

The moment we entered the Mole we were surrounded by boats waiting for the travellers, like carrion birds for their prey. Happily the landlord of the "Quatre Nations" aware of our coming, received us at once into his own boat, and bore off us and our baggage in peace and safety to the redoubtable Dogana (custom-house). Alas for those who, strangers and unaided, had, guided by the farthing rushlight on the deck, to recover their luggage and stumble their way down the ladder into the clutches of the harpies in the boats below, if they did not meantime, in the lurchings of the boat, miss footing and slip into the sea, to become the prey of the gentler monsters of the deep! To reach the shore we had to make our way through the confusion and uproar of men-of-war's crews and soldiers hastening on board their respective ships for the last muster-roll.

For as at this time all Italy was impatient for war, she had centered here her iron-clads, ready to rush upon the Austrians. After a vexatious search by candle-light at the Dogana we became free men, and in the comforts of our hotel felt something of the touch of home, and dreamed away in peace the night, till daylight, when church-bells, that plague of Italy, bade defiance to all endeavours after sleep. And so we rose to study Genoa in its galleries, palaces, and churches, ere we resumed our march by the glorious Riviera to Spezia.

idolatry" may be seen by her image, complacently sitting crowned with stars, and with the legend of its devotion at her feet—"Posuerunt me custodems" ("Me have they placed as guardian"). Alas! if they have no better keeping than her, "the watchman waketh but in vain."

The old fortifications, once so strong, and deemed impregnable, are now being tumbled down as useless by the hand of modern science, and in their place streets of palaces rise on every side, while forts, bastions, and casemates, more adapted to modern warfare, crown the beautiful hills, which on the road-side girdle the city round. Our road lies through most enchanting scenery. On one side tower the Apennines majestically, line above line, while on the other a coast studded with towns, villas, and gardens bays round the blue tideless sea. Another charm in the landscape is the air of ease and industrial comfort everywhere visible in the towns and villages, through which you are continually passing. The lordly mansion with its hanging gardens, pavilions and terraces, seems not more comfortable than the humble abode of the artisan by its side, where the busy shuttle is plied. As if to give the last touch to beauty, the morning broke cloudless, and the face of the deep sea below was checkered over, far and wide, with vessels spreading their white wings to catch the freshening breeze. From Rota, the highest point in our ascent, we took our last farewell of Genoa and its beautifully indented coast. From the old lighthouse that rises proudly over its harbour hither to Capo Porto Fino, the villages and country seats by which we passed seem one continuous city. Hence we drive through a gloomy tunnel to open at once upon a scene rivalling that through which we had passed from Genoa with wondering joy—the bay as smiling, though the range is more bounded. Here Capo Fino projecting far into the sea shuts out the distant shore, along which we had coasted from Nice, and precipitous breaks back the waves with abrupt rocks. Yonder, before us, the bluff of Sestri, covered with majestic pines, gracefully descends to check the chafing waves. Inward the Mediterranean presses between, laving smiling towns and villages that rise along the circling shores, while behind deep valleys open under the savage brow of the cloud-capped Apennines. The sun was already streaming his last rays upon the bay when we reached our hotel. Our eccentric fellow-traveller, the knight of the ferns, had arrived before us. He was so busily engaged at the time in a random search after another lost treasure that he had scarcely leisure to greet us. By the greatest good fortune, he had only a few hours before succeeded in getting possession of duplicate specimens of the ferns he had been so cruelly deprived of at San Maurizio, and now these too had unaccountably disappeared! From this severer blow of unrelenting fate it was my good fortune to relieve him, for on going into my room there on the sofa lay the precious objects of all his anxious care! When I sallied forth in the early morning, and saw before the houses the glorious sea rippling upon the softest sand, and behind, one of the grandest valleys of the Apennines opening full upon me, I wondered that such a spot should not be as much resorted to as any of the fairest which allure our restless tourists from their homes.

The moment we turned our backs upon Sestri, we changed at once both earth and sky. We had no longer a smiling coast below, or above an atmosphere trembling with joy. We rose over the steep sides of the bare Apennines higher and higher, while gulfs of valleys deeper and deeper lay below us, rendered more sombre and sublime because only seen through fitful breaks of a dense fog, which sometimes made the light of mid-day resemble sober twilight. Our driver bade us rejoice in a lesser evil. We might have had, as often happens, a wind to render our passage difficult or impossible. He had driven upon the road for forty years, and so was full of old experiences and superstitious "saws." On passing under a solitary hermitage, perched amid the clouds on the top of a mountain, he recounted, head uncovered, devoutly crossing himself the while, how that the Madonna of this spot regularly year by year on the eve of her festival, operates a miracle on a few olive trees piously enclosed in consequence before her shrine. As I cared little for saintly legends, I tried to bring him to those substantial traditions of brigand exploits, which, within my own memory, belonged of right to this pass. Either, however, his recollection failed, except in connection with saintly puerilities, or the establishment of patrol stations at regular intervals along the road had so operated that even the memory of highway-violence had died out. In his eyes the two ruling terrors of this pass were high winds in stormy weather, and hungry wolves in winter.

"But are there bears?" I asked.

"Dio me ne guardi!" ("God preserve me from them!") was his prompt reply, almost springing from his seat, and giving his horses a nervous lash, as though growling Bruin was already at his heels.

We descended to Borghetto, a wretched, brigand-looking haunt even now, but charmingly situated at the junction of valleys where mountain torrents unite into a river, along whose banks we made our way. The prospect smiles again—fertile hills and valleys, picturesque churches and villages, open all around. We rose toward even-tide over the last spur of the Apennines, and welcomed the bay of Spezia, running deep inland under protecting batteries, and terminating in a vast and quiet haven, where ships of any burthen find safe anchorage. A busy town lines the shore. At the time of our arrival the streets were crowded with sailors, and the whole place in the fever of wild excitement attendant upon expected war. Several iron-clads were anchored across the gulf, between which and the arsenals dwarf steamers were in continual passage, giving life to the bay, heightened, too, by men-of-war gigs and pleasure boats crossing one another's tracks in every direction. At that moment the batteries were booming an answering salute to two Prussian men-of-war, which had just entered the harbour with Prince Wladimir on board. Much of the general excitement of this moment was to be attributed to this event. For as the rumour ran, that Prussia had concluded an offensive and defensive treaty with Italy, it could not but follow such a union that the Alps and the sea would be secured to Italy as her natural barrier against the active will of Austria, and even the unfavouring will of France.

During the brief stay which I made in Spezia, I was rejoiced to find that endeavours were being made to evangelize the natives. I wish I could say as much with regard to our Christian duty in connection with the hundreds of English workmen who are employed there and in the neighbourhood. But, alas! while we are sensitively alive to the importance of protecting our commercial and political interests wherever we can place a consular agent, we are very unwilling to show any sympathy with our faith where Romanism prevails. As this is not an accident confined to a locality, but a principle adopted by our Government, and as "whatever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" belongs alike to God's just retribution to nations and to men, I look to the future with sadness.

"Alas! for my country."

At Spezia we reached the territory of the great destroyer of natural beauty—the tyrant Railway. By his will we may now, lightning-winged, fly by the romantic rocks of Carrara, the smiling Pisan hills, and the flat, luxuriant plains through which the Arno winds its passage to the sea. And still the tyrant, in ceaseless swoop, hurries us breathless on till we repose at last in the quiet town of Piombino, and safely rest among its old feudal battlements and towers. Here, in the silence of general decay, even the echo of the restless world is hushed and silence unbroken, save by the railway screams, which even here, seven miles off, scared my midnight slumbers.

Although we had reached a quiet resting-place, we had not, however, landed in Goshen; Piombino's one only inn (less select than Mivart's!) had no couch of repose, and nothing for food save good bread and an old cock, whose scream till now had challenged for years the bell of the neighbouring clock-tower—the only other public voice in the place. As we sat prisoners of hope in the large public-room, we were subjected to the wondering eyes of continual incomers throughout the evening. There they abode fixed, staring, and silent, as though fascinated. I thought it an odd expression of hospitality, but as their demeanour was otherwise courteous and respectful, I left them to the enjoyment of their gaze. I had been followed by the same respectful curiosity, when, soon after our arrival, I had descended to the little port and then rambled among the fortifications that rise and bend along the rocky shore. Wherever I turned, a gazing but respectful throng followed in my rear. As I could not be alone, I returned to the inn to find the like admiration there.

After having subjected the cravings of the inner man to the wretched accommodation of the place; I was foreshadowing a night of suffering on rush-bottomed-chairs, or on a wooden table in the public room among my gazing friends, when the worthy landlady appeared with the news, every word of which was music to my ear, that two of the magnates of the place would shelter us for the night. My friend's lot and mine fell to an old soldier, en retraite. in whose house I found, to my surprise, quarters such as should satisfy the most fastidious. The only thing I regretted in my room was, that I could nowhere turn without my Protestant eyes being offended. Here St. Barbara was tossing up in the air with a battlemented castle, fortalice, and donjon all complete, light as a shuttlecock. There St. Lucia, a lovely maiden gorgeously arrayed, presented you with her own bright eyes served up on a dish. As to the Virgin Mary, there were no less than sixteen modifications of herself and attributes, according to the infallible dogmas of the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church. Imagine, if, as I lay in bed, I chanced with the faintest light to open my eyes, what a mystery of the lie at once beset my thoughts; for thought will follow sight. However, beyond the removal of these objects of Romish idolatry, I had nothing to desire in my room save a ladder to rise to my bed, for there lay mattress on mattress, piled like Pelion on Ossa. Our passage through the streets to our resting-place was quite an ovation. An admiring crowd pressed at a respectful distance behind, while the landlady and her bright-eyed daughters lighted the way before us with those picturesque triple-wicked lamps which have become household gods in Italy, since the fatal night of Pompeii's ruin, when mothers bore them shrieking before their children to light their hopeless way.

As we rose to our rooms the whole household was marshalled out, the soldier to the front, bowing and scraping to do us honour. All this was so marvellous we might well rub our eyes to be assured we were not dreaming, and our boyhood's fables of enchanted castles sober realities after all. Our servant the following morning unriddled the enigma. The whole town was seized with the idea that my friend, moving, alas! on crutches, was one of Garibaldi's wounded Generals; his nephew, Garibaldi's gallant son; and I, the great hero himself! All was now explained, to our great amusement.

Early the following day the place was all astir at news of our departure. A crowd lined the pier, and hung over the walls above as we descended to embark for Elba. The moment we set foot on board every hand was raised to greet us; and we pushed out into the channel, leaving as much good-will and respect behind us as though the modern Cincinnatus himself had arrived from rocky Caprera equal to the exigencies of his country, now menaced with war.

The wind favoured our starting. The fortress-girt peninsula soon lessened behind us, and bayed round to the picturesque promontory of Castiglione. As soon, however, as we reached the midway lighthouse-rock of Palmajuola, its capricious breath rose and fell, and shifted to every point of the compass, so that it was only by continual tacks that we anchored at last in the busy harbour of Rio Marina. Although Elba had stretched its full island-length to our sight the moment we embarked, it was not until we cleared the lighthouse rock, darkening between, that we caught sight of Rio. Our first view of its situation, although extremely pretty, rather disappointed us. It lies in a less romantic part of the coast than Lungone or Ferraio, and its harbour is little more than an inbaying curve under high hills, between which a lively stream babbles its way downwards to the harbour.

But what it loses in the picturesque, it gains in commerce. The nearer hills breasting the sea are so many giant stores of iron, needing no labour of mining but lying ready to the hand of man. To draught this off to a large number of ships and lighters in the harbour is the constant employment of streams of half-starved donkeys, and "men more savage far than they."

The spare red forms of the men, naked to the waist, screaming and hurrying along under their light burthen, would make you fear you were reaching the lair of some lawless Red-Indian tribe. Everything was tinged with the rusty hue of the ore. The sea itself was like blood. Among the lofty blocks of houses, clustered together at the mouth of a narrow valley, and heaped up one over the other, you look in vain for what is such a pleasing feature in the Italian landscape—white churches with tall belfries, and houses with open galleries over the dark blue sea, and beneath a sky as blue. The appearance of our craft, so unusual there, soon attracted general attention. All the idlers of the place, as well as the Red Indian-looking facchini (porters) rushed down to our landing, and gave us a less gracious greeting than had welcomed our arrival and departure at Piombino. However, we adventured on shore, and making our way through the savage crowd, begrimed with the ore-dust, were joined in a few minutes by a gentlemanly looking person, bearing the human face divine. This was the good pastor of the Protestants. Under his guidance our party was divided among the "brethren," as they call themselves. My friend and his nephew were sheltered by the pastor, our servant by Cignoni, the patriarch of the brotherhood, and I fell to the lot of his brave coadjutor and first brother-convert, Quattrini. By the time we had fairly settled into our quarters the shades of evening gathered round us, not, however, until my friend had traversed every inch of the young gospel territory, and we had mutually thanked God for our safety past, and had committed to Him our purposes in faith and with courage for days to come.

BLACKETT BOTCHERBY.

FOUND AMONG THE PAPERS OF A YOUNG MAN.

THERE was great excitement at Ems on the 12th of August, 18—, for the Empress of Russia had arrived, and the kings of Prussia and of Saxony were expected that same day. The street in which my hotel was situated was crowded with people who had flowed together from Coblentz and Mayence, and the other places in the neighbourhood, large and small, to gaze at the glory of crowned heads. There was a continuous buzz and hum under my window, so that I should almost have fancied myself sitting in my office at the works, had not the merry tunes of the music band, stationed before the empress's hotel, and the loud hurras of the people, reminded me that I was not on the bank of the Thames amidst my industrious work-people, but on the bank of the Lahn amidst a crowd of idlers who, as it seemed had come for no other purpose but to waste their time and to spend their money.

I never cared very much about such manifestations of princely splendour and popular curiosity. Least of all did I do so now that I found myself engaged in a sad work, which contrasted harshly with the gay tones and tunes outside. I was looking over the papers of my cousin, Mr. Alfred Hamerton, whom I had conveyed to his last resting-place a few day before. Poor Alfred! He had not yet completed his twenty-eighth year, and if ever a young man seemed to have a long life in prospect it was he. His constitution appeared to be of iron, and he had an annual income of two thousand pounds, which promised to prove a safeguard against soul-depressing cares. But where is there a constitution which, though ever so strong, uncontrolled passion cannot destroy? or a position in life so independent that sin cannot turn it into slavery? My good father often used to say: "The best diet and the best system of economy are to be found in the Gospel." This truth was frequently repeated in Alfred's hearing; but alas! he forgot it as often as he heard it.

Not that he was an out-and-out profligate, or what is called a vicious character. If you could have got him by himself, away from the temptations of a pleasure-loving and a pleasure-making world—say at your quiet house down in the country, to stay with you for a month—you would not only have found him a well-behaved, amiable young fellow, but a generous, kind-hearted friend, who would open his mind to everything noble and beautiful and good. In a confidential chat he would have confessed his follies, and acknowledged his weakness in resisting temptation; he would have admired the noble self-control of the faithful Christian, and assured you of his sincere resolution henceforth to alter his life and become a useful member of society. In such moments as these you might, without very much difficulty, have obtained from him a couple of sovereigns for a poor family, or a ten-pound note for some charitable purpose. But he would no sooner have left you than he would yield to the siren lure of pleasure, as you would have found could you, under the charm of the ring of Gyges, have followed him. It was the same in every place—where people assemble for spending their fortune in pleasure,—whether in London, Paris, Hamburg, or Rome. He passed the greater part of his time in England however, as he was a bad linguist, and, besides, was very fond of boating, hunting, and racing.

In the last year of his life he had repaired to the Continent, chiefly for the sake of his health, which had suffered much under his too frequent excesses. He had been recommended to go to the waters of Ems. After he had come of age I had, at his own request, taken charge of collecting his income and forwarding it to him, and I was of course constantly in correspondence with him. In his last letter, which was written a fortnight before his death, he said that he was progressing favourably, and was almost as robust as ever again. The sad astonishment can scarcely be imagined with which a few days later I received a telegram, urging me to go to Ems at once, as he was seriously ill. Alas! I found him in his last struggle. He had fought a duel with a Spanish nobleman, and had been shot in the breast. I came just in time to receive from his hand the keys of his boxes, and to learn his desire concerning his papers. He requested me to go over them all, to keep such as I should deem it necessary to preserve, and to burn the rest.

And so I was looking over those papers,—a confused collection of letters, accounts, bills, promissory notes, and scraps of poetry mostly in the erotic style,—which had been collected during a period of six years, and put into a large leather bag without any sort of order. It was evident enough that he had cherished the intention of arranging the mass, but had never settled down to it, though it would hardly have taken him more than a couple of hours, since his correspondence had not been very great, and most of the bills were waste paper. But he had been careless, slovenly, procrastinating, very seldom being led by a sense of duty, and always yielding to the impression of the moment. And it was sad work to read the contents of most of the letters, and to notice to what most of the bills referred. While on the one hand they bore ample testimony to his having been anything but a churlish, selfish fellow, yet they all bore witness at the same time to the fact that he had only lived to please and to worship his own beloved self. It was evident he had always, and often in the most liberal way, been disposed to make others happy, but with the intention, at the same time, that he himself should enjoy the greater part of the pleasure. Of that love which is willing to deny itself and to suffer in order to make others happy, he seems to have known very little indeed. There were a few of the promissory notes for sums he had lent and which had never been repaid, but the amounts were comparatively small. On the other hand, there were many bills which he had paid after standing over for four and five years, and among the letters there were some from shopkeepers and tradespeople urgently requesting him in the most humble tone to favour them with payment. I could not help wondering why he had preserved such documents among his papers, but it soon appeared plain enough that he was one of those who never tear up a letter, though they have not the slightest intention of reading it again. Indeed the collection presented a remarkable photograph of his character. It exhibited a great many good principles dormant or in embryo, but not one of them in due and healthful development. The very preservation of the documents showed a sense of thrift, but their confused and neglected condition proved that that sense had invariably died out at each attempt to carry it into practice. Some sense of order was testified to by the fact of all his expenditure being noted down, even to the trifle of a sixpence paid to a porter; but the practical result again was completely lost in his disorder, for his notes were written partly in memorandum-books and partly on scraps of paper, old envelopes, steamboat-bills, &c. There were undeniable signs of literary taste, for some of the pieces of poetry and prose compositions were worth reading from a merely literary point of view; but not one of them was finished. His higher inclinations had each time been suffocated by his passion for pleasure. Nay, I even picked up a few sheets purporting to be the introduction to a religious poem in the Miltonian style; and certainly, if their form was less poetical than that of "Paradise Lost," their sentiments were not less biblical. I also found bills containing considerable sums paid for music and musical instruments and for instruction in that department of art. He must have been a performer on the piano, the violoncello, and the cornet-à-piston; and yet, though I had often met him at drawing-room parties, where everybody was invited to try his or her talents, I never even so much as heard him confess that he played any instrument at all. The booksellers' bills were also numerous and heavy. They contained the titles of books which seemed to indicate that their reader must have been a person of great information and much taste. I found all those books in the library at his residence at Richmond, but, with only a few exceptions, they were uncut.

In short, poor Alfred had been one of that privileged yet unhappy class of young men who, as necessity does not compel them to work, think that they need not work at all, and that their money renders them independent even of God, because it makes them independent of men. The solemn sentence uttered by the Divine Judge in Paradise, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," was certainly a severe one; but experience has shown, at the same time, that it also implied wisdom and beneficence. And none of us can deem himself exempt from that rule, without in one way or other severely injuring both himself and society. The possession of money may of course be either a blessing or a curse; but it is most decidedly the latter where it causes man to become an idler, and to live only for his own personal enjoyment. Even though his idleness should only consist in what is called harmless frivolity, and though his enjoyment should limit itself to what are called innocent pleasures, yet such a man's life is a real loss to himself, to society, and to the kingdom of God. And this, not because of any evil positively committed, but because of so much good which he is expected, nay bound, to do, but has left undone. And we creatures of flesh and blood, who judge only from what impresses our senses, are prone to overlook and to think lightly of what we call our sins of omission; but it would be as well for us to keep in mind that our Lord pronounced the same awful verdict upon the slothful servant who omitted to use his one talent well, as He will pronounce on the coming day of judgment upon the "doers of iniquity," whom He shall cast into a place where there shall be "wailing and gnashing of teeth." (Matt. xiii. 41—42.)

That my poor cousin Alfred had in this way fearfully wasted his precious life became fully clear to me when I had finished the examination of his papers. Having assorted and arranged those papers according to their dates, I found myself in the possession of pretty complete diary of his life from the time he had come of age till his death, a period of nearly seven years. One of the documents which first attracted my attention was a letter of my own, which I had written to him when he was in Paris. A piece cut from the Times, giving a description of the fearful Hartley coal-pit accident, was enclosed. As at that time I had about £500 in hand to his credit, I advised him to permit me to send a donation of £50 to the bereaved widows and orphans. In his next letter he declined to do this, at the same time requesting me to send him £300 by return of post. I was rather surprised at that request, as I had sent him £500 only a fortnight before. I now, however, learnt the cause of it. Among the letters was one from a Mr. Prime, written a day or two before mine, in which, in a very familiar style, he asked Alfred for a loan of £300; and accordingly I found among the bills his promissory note, bearing the date of the day subsequent to that on which I had sent Alfred the money. Now, I had known that loose but highly-talented, witty, and handsome parasite only too well, and had always regretted that Alfred had made him his bosom friend. The promissory note was waste paper, for Mr. Prime eloped a few days later with a banker's wife, and has never been heard of since.

There was another letter which struck me in a peculiar way. It was from the clergyman of the parish in which Alfred's father had resided till his death. It referred to the widow and family of his father's gardener. It told a sad and touching story. It reminded Alfred of the two eldest boys of that poor woman, who when children had shared his pleasures and sports. Sickness had reduced her to such straitened circumstances that she could no longer support her numerous family. Her eldest son had obtained a situation by which he would have been fully able to have maintained her and his brothers and sisters; but he lost his life by an accident, and so the sorely-visited mother was wholly deprived of her support. Her second son, however, a nice and capable young man of twenty-two, would be able to support her if he could obtain £200 to buy the good-will of a respectable business which was on sale. The clergyman had formed a scheme by which, if he found eight persons who would each give £25, the thing might be done. He had been so successful as to find seven, and now requested Alfred to be the eighth.

After having read this letter I looked into Alfred's memorandum-book about that date, but could find no such sum put down among his expenditure. But I found he had paid a sum of £35 10*s.* 9*d.* a few days after the receipt of that letter for a dinner-party which he was compelled to give in consequence of having lost a bet.

This reminded me of a somewhat similar case that had taken place four years ago. There was a distant relative of Alfred's, who had a wife and four children. The eldest boy was a fine lad, gifted with uncommon intellectual capacities, and, on account of his amiable character and noble principles, the favourite of all who knew him. As far as I could judge, William was a truly Christian young man, who had given his heart to the Saviour, and exercised a blessed influence upon other young men with whom he was intimate. As his father, who was an officer on half-pay, could not afford to give him an education much above that of the trading class, he was apprenticed to a bookseller and bookbinder; but, though William satisfied his master pretty well, he was often found fault with for giving more attention to the inside of the books than to their outside. Indeed whenever he could spare a moment's time he was found reading. By the aid of a friend who was a little acquainted with the old classics he had brought himself on so far as to be able to read Homer and Virgil. His father would sometimes send me some of his little essays, which ran mostly on religious topics, and they always astonished me by the power of thought and the beauty of style which they exhibited. It may be imagined what a sad trial it was for the good man to find himself unable to gratify his son's earnest wish to go to the university and study for the ministry. Nor was there any one among his friends who did not think it a pity that such a highly-gifted and well-principled young man was compelled to bury his talents in the dust of a bookbinder's shop. One day, Alfred happened to stay with me for a couple of days, and I availed myself of a favourable moment to bring the matter under his notice. I showed him what a blessing he might confer not only upon that good family, but also upon the Church and society at large, by giving £100 say for three years, in which case I would pledge myself to find the remainder of the required sum. He promised to think over the matter and to let me know his resolution. As one week after another passed away without his answer coming, I wrote to him. He refused, on the ground of "having so many claims upon his purse just now, that he saw himself obliged to retrench his expenditure for the time being." So I had to look out for some other channel through which William might obtain the desired help, and after much writing and fighting I at length succeeded in my object through the liberality of several friends.

Now that I had a full insight into Alfred's books, or rather scraps and slips, I could not repress my curiosity to know what in the world those "many claims upon his purse" could be, which had prevented him from doing that good work. Alas! I had not long to seek. It appeared from his notes and the bills of that year that he had paid £250 to the tobacconist, £350 to the wine merchant, and about £200 to his musical teachers for teaching him what he never even intended to learn.

I might lengthen the sad list by other instances drawn from the papers then lying before me. But there was one letter which struck me more than all. It was from Mr. Coleridge, his teacher, who had continued his adviser and friend till the last day of his minority. It was written on the occasion of his having received a letter from Alfred after his last illness, when, having risen from a sick-bed which had threatened to become his death-bed, he was about to start for Ems. It ran as follows:—

"My dear Alfred,—Your letter of the 16th of last month came duly to hand, and has in one sense given me much pleasure, though in another it greatly distressed me. I am glad to learn that your health is improving, but I am sorry to find that you 'hope to be able soon to return to your usual course of life.' Permit me, as your sincere and cordial friend, to say that this is exactly the thing which I had hoped you would not do. You know, dear friend, that nobody ever loved you more or better than I, and God knows I love you truly still. I have my defects, as every human being has, but, as far as I can recollect, I have not been deficient in trying to show you the only way that can lead you towards true happiness, and I have not withheld anything from you that it was in my power to give, that you might be well equipped for your journey through this world towards your everlasting destiny. How often have I prayed with you and for you that God, who in his infinite love has bestowed on you so many and so valuable privileges, might in his grace enable you to become a useful member of society and a true member of the Church of Christ! How zealously and with how much delight have I studied with and for you to provide you with the knowledge of all such sciences as I supposed it would be necessary or desirable for you to know, that you might be able to carry about a rich store on which to draw freely for the benefit of many who would be in need of your co-operation, your advice, and your help! You must remember how often, when I sat down with you to chat confidentially, I would say, 'Dear Alf., when you come of age, you will be in the possession of a considerable income, not one-fifth of which will be required for your support. Remember the great responsibility which, along with the possession of that money, will devolve upon you. Money is power. If used well, it will be a source of joy both to God and men; if used badly, it will bring God's displeasure upon you, and not only injure your neighbours but ruin yourself, if not for this life, at least for the life to come. If you understand this well, you will soon find that a glorious life is already opened up for you here below. No condition on earth can be more desirable than that of a young man who, through the grace of God, not only has the heart to do good, but also the means to do it. Money is not only power, but also time. Through your independent position in society you will have time for doing many a good work, such as can only be done by persons who are not under the necessity of toiling all the day for their bread. The moment you come of age, great temptation will be presented to you to abuse your independence and liberty by devoting your precious life to mere self-enjoyment, if not self-indulgence. Your money will, as it were, receive a voice, and say to you: "You are young and strong, and the whole world is lying before you; there is no necessity for you to bury yourself in a close dark office, or to bend your back under the burden of dull and tedious drudgery. You are a free man and have nobody to care for but yourself; don't be such a fool as to place yourself under any obligation. Keep aloof from all restricting engagements, and be your own lord and master; spread out your wings and soar aloft, and fly away withersoever you please; we, your friends and servants, we, your sovereigns and bank-notes, will carry you through the world after your own heart's pleasure, and when one day you have enjoyed yourself to the full, and long for a change, for some settlement, very well, you will then have plenty of time to consider, and you will be able to make your arrangements to your convenience.'"

"You know that I often spoke to you in this way, dear boy, and, alas! I have not only found that my picture of the temptations you would meet was correct, but that you have also realised my fear that you would be too weak to stand against its alluring power. Nearly seven years have now elapsed since that day when, in the company of your best friends, we celebrated the happy event of your majority. I know I have no right to ask you how you have spent that large and precious portion of your life. But, as your truly loving friend, I think I have a right to remind you that one day the great Judge, who has given you that life, will ask you how you have spent it. As far as I can judge, my dear Alfred,—and do not suppose that I am writing this in an angry mood; God knows how deeply my loving heart is grieved while I am thinking of you!—as far as I can judge, these seven years have been wasted. They are like a land of good soil, but totally barren, because it has not been cultivated. If the great Husbandman were to come now to reap fruits from your life's tree, would He find there anything save shrivelled leaves, which may have pleased you, but are of no profit to any one else? If He were to ask you the question, 'What have you done with the time which I have allotted to you? What have you done with your money, with your talents and capacities?' what would your answer be but this—'I have eaten, and drunk, and slept; I have hunted, and fished, and boated; I have played and gambled; I have travelled about, and attended concerts, and balls, and theatres; I have enjoyed myself, and—that is all I have done.'

"Ah! dear Alfred, is that answer worthy, I do not say of a Christian created in Christ Jesus unto good works, but of a rational being created for something higher here on earth than the pastimes of monkeys in the forest, which jump and skip from one tree to another?

"And how much good could you have done in these past years! I know it was not your plan, in the first days after you had come of age, to spend your life in idleness. I remember you told me confidentially that it was your intention to go into some suitable business by-and-by, as you perceived that it would have a bad influence upon your character to continue without any fixed occupation. But I also remember how I urged you to set out in search of such a business at once, and not to rest till you had found one. I knew that the longer you delayed it the more you would get into the habit of lounging and loitering about in idleness, till at length you would feel disinclined to come to some settlement. I seriously warned you against that fatal spirit of procrastination. I spoke to you about the beneficial effect of voluntary submission to a certain rule, by imposing that rule upon ourselves by our own free will. Our nature is not so constituted that we can live happily by doing only what we desire to do. There ought to be things which we must do, and the more regular those obligatory things are in their claims, the more regular and orderly becomes our life. A man who exempts himself from any obligation whatever, cannot fail to become a burdensome object to himself and a nuisance to society. Such a man is on the way to commit spiritual suicide. He sends his mind adrift on the vast ocean of vague generalities, till at length it becomes hopelessly feeble. There is such a thing as 'a will of God,' which every one of us, whether rich or poor, is bound to obey; and every one should therefore conscientiously inquire what God's will is in his particular case. Alas! I am afraid, dear Alfred, that you are under the delusion of supposing that your money relieves you from that obligation. But can you really believe that God gave you your wealth to enable you to eat without working?

"But I must again repeat, How much good could you have done in these past years! You had every year at least from £1000 to £1500 at your disposal, which you could have spent for good purposes without the slightest inconvenience to yourself. I do not mean that you should have given away that sum in mere alms. You know I often said that an alms-giver is a beggar-breeder. But there are so many good, excellent people who would rather beg than starve, and who work hard day and night to support themselves and their families respectably. From circumstances not under their control they are constantly in danger of breaking down under the heavy burden of daily cares. How many is there of this sort, even among your acquaintances, to whom you could have given a kindly lift! What a joy you could have caused in the heart of many a good man or respectable widow, and what a blessing could you have brought to many a struggling family, by merely posting a ten or twenty pound note, the absence of which you would never have felt, except as a cause of blessed joy to yourself! I remember I spoke to you when at Brighton, four or five years ago, about John Dalton's case, who, as you knew, was reduced in worldly circumstances. Fifty pounds from your friendly hand would have rescued that good man and his family from the brink of the pit into which, alas! they have sunk. He died from grief and exhaustion, and his widow, after a year's hopeless struggle, went with her children into the workhouse. When I heard the sad story I could not help sighing, 'Oh, Alfred, how could you have refused to help that man!'

"When the news reached me that your health was bad, I felt very sorry, though I must confess I was not surprised. All I had heard about your way of living had made me wonder long since that your constitution, strong though it was, did not break down. But when I learnt that you were improving, I hoped and prayed that you might now show that you had gathered wisdom from the serious lesson God had taught you. Oh, my dearest Alfred! I entreat you, let that lesson not have been taught to you in vain. You are still a young man, and a long life may be yet in store for you. Let it prove a new life. Let the past be buried for ever; appear amongst us as a new man risen from a grave in which you for seven years have been lying—dead to us, dead to yourself, dead to God! Remember that Christ shed his blood for you, that you are not your own but his, that it is unto Him and not unto yourself that you are to live. He has so much good and glorious work for you to do! I beseech you, begin to do it now, and henceforth, you will experience what a blessing, what a happiness, what a delight it is to be a faithful and active servant of that amiable and adorable Master! If there is any love towards Him in your heart, nay, if there is any true love towards your own soul in you, you cannot possibly 'return to your usual course of life.' It has pleased God in his merciful long-suffering to raise you from a sick-bed, which might have become your death-bed. Do hear his tender, warning voice: 'Behold, thou art made whole. Sin no more, lest a worst thing come unto thee.'"

In this way the letter proceeded. I could not read it without emotion. Alas, why did that unhappy young man never listen to the words of that true and noble friend! The letter was dated the 9th of June. On the 9th of August, Alfred was a corpse. Only two months! How fearful is God in his judgment, when his long-suffering is at an end!

CONSIDER.

WHAT say Autumn's hoary woods,
Her leaf-beds dank where fever broods?
"Child of created man! we are as thou;
Thou art as we.
Who lists may see
In us the change to which his strength must bow.
All made from earth, all nourished from the mould,
Alike short time we live, alike so soon grow old."

What say Winter's icebound springs,
Her blackened flowers where sad thought clings?
"Child of created man! we are as thou;
Thou art as we.
Death claspeth thee,
The chill of a dread hand to lay thee low.
Grave-powers that hold the earth our gaolers are:
The sound we make is still; the place we fill is bare."

What says Springtime's lifeful sheen,
Her well-gemmed sward, her buds of green?
"Child of created man! we are as thou;
Thou art as we.
That which shall be
Lies ready in thine heart to spring and grow.
Frost chains are burst that held our life enthralled;
The new sun's loving might our being has recalled."

What say Summer's glorious days,
Her teeming fields, her wealth of praise?
"Child of created man! we are as thou;
Thou art as we.
Eternity
A praiseful vast of life to thee shall show.
Made for God's glory, while our time remains,
We — emblems of the blest — lift Godward ceaseless strains."

What then, Christian, says thy faith?
Our Lord is Lord of Hell and Death.
"Child of created man! He was as thou,
That thou—as He—
Might victor be
O'er all that brings decay on things below.
Let His Truth work. To thee, too, power is given Autumn and Winter past to spring to light in Heaven."

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.

Even in this island, over which the Angel of Peace has so long spread his wings, and where the sight of bloodshed has been all but unknown for generations, there was scarcely a heart that, when the long-dreaded war actually began in Germany and Italy, did not echo the lament of Jeremiah,—"My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my very heart: my heart maketh a noise in me; I cannot hold my peace, because thou hast heard, O my soul, the noise of the trumpet, the alarm of war." If on the one hand, our hearts sunk at the prospect of the whole of Europe being wrapped in the fiercest flames of war, and at our utter inability to prevent so frightful a catastrophe; on the other, we could not but commit the issues to the great Ruler of the nations the more earnestly that we felt that no power but His could restrain the floods, or make the collisions of war work out the ends of mercy. It was sad to think that in the middle of the nineteenth century, civilised nations should be unable to adjust their differences without recourse to the barbarous and cruel struggles of war; and prayer rose with the greater fervour that it would please God, if war was to be, to confine its area, to shorten its duration, and to make it subservient to the highest good of the nations. The utterly unexpected turn of events, only ten days after the first shot was fired, when the mediation of Napoleon was offered, and an armistice proposed, showed how true it is that "the king's heart is in the hands of the Lord as the rivers of water; he turneth it whithersoever he will." Whatever may be the issue,—whether permanent peace is really near, or a fierce conflict is yet to rage,—the encouragement to prayer derived from what has already happened should not be lost sight of. Whatever in itself is evil is to be deprecated by the Christian, and of all things that belong to this category, war surely has a foremost place. Yet even in praying against war, it is not to be forgotten by us that the Almighty may see cause to use that catastrophe in its worst form for the punishment of men's sins; but should that alternative be realised, all the greater is the need to pray, that so dread a chastisement may not be inflicted without carrying in its bosom and leaving behind it the highest blessings of mercy and love.

It is very certain that the hopes of the Papal party were bound up with the success of the Austrians. In the anticipated triumph of the Austrian armies, they saw the coming humiliation of Italian liberalism, the restoration of the dispossessed Italian princes, and the recovery of the territories which had been torn from the Pope. Among the happy scenes of the future, one that doubtless occupied a prominent place in the view of some was, the arrestment of the work of Protestant propagandism, the expulsion of Waldensian missionaries and evangelists, the closing of Protestant schools and meetings, and possibly the repetition over the peninsula of the riot and murders of Barletta. In one hour, in one moment, all was changed. A single telegram announcing the defeat and flight of the grand army under Benedek turned all faces to blackness, and verified the old saying, "Man proposes, but God disposes." It is remarkable, too, how the calculations of the most sagacious were entirely falsified by the events of ten days. At first, it was elaborately proved that the war must be protracted and obstinate, and that it would be long before the balance would incline to either side. After the battle of Sadowa, and the offered mediation of the French Emperor, the cry was, that the war was over. Conjecture leapt from one extreme to the opposite. It used to be said of the American war and the results in which it issued, that there never had been a great movement so visibly controlled and ordered by the hand of Providence. The issue of events in Europe may cause the remark to be transferred to the Old World. Even in the earliest stages of the present movement, it was made plain, as the Spectator strikingly remarked, that "God governs as well as reigns." Plots contrived by unscrupulous men for the aggrandisement of dynasties and the concentration of power, may yet be made subservient to the advancement of human liberty and progress, and to the furtherance of the glorious Gospel.

While the cannon has been sending forth its volleys in Italy and Bohemia, England has been the scene of conflicts of another kind. Of the change of ministry that has taken place, we say nothing here, because its bearing on religious interests is too remote and indefinite to bring it within our scope. But the contest about ritualism has attained an importance and magnitude that seem to carry us back to the struggles of the seventeenth century. In those days, however, the question was, whether those who would not conform to the use of certain vestments and ceremonies were to be tolerated; at present, the question is, whether indulgence is to be given to those who are introducing vestments and ritualistic ceremonies hitherto made use of only in the Popish Church. The question has been debated in the House of Lords; deputations, with petitions signed by thousands, have brought the matter earnestly under the notice of the two archbishops; and it has been eagerly discussed both in the upper and lower Houses of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury. In the lower House it was introduced in the form of a report by Dr. Goodwin, Dean of Ely, the chairman of a committee appointed at a previous meeting. In proof of the deliberate consideration which the committee had given the subject it was stated, that besides the time devoted to it privately by the members individually, no less than eighty hours had been consumed in their joint deliberations. The six topics discussed in the report were—The Use of Special Vestments in celebrating the Communion; the Use of Altar-lights; Incense; Elevation of the Elements after Consecration; Encouragement of non-communicants to remain during Celebration of Communion; and the Use of Wafer-bread. On the first three, the committee were of opinion that they were neither contrary to the law, nor required by it; on the other three, their judgment was, that they were contrary to the constitution and practice of the Church of England. At the same time, no recommendation was given to submit the questions to a legal tribunal. In the lower House of Convocation, it was moved by the Dean of Ely, that the House adopt the report as a temperate statement on the subject of ritual practice in the Church of England, and as calculated to assist in allaying anxieties and clearing doubts. It was also moved, that steps be taken to ascertain the legality of the practices reported on. The former motion was carried by a large majority. The general feeling seemed to be, that the moral influence of public sentiment would be more efficient than legal decisions, even if the latter could be obtained, in putting down the prevalent ritualistic tendency, which was generally felt to be alike childish and mischievous.

Another topic that occupied much of the attention of the Convocation was, the Episcopate of Natal. Certain questions had been submitted to Convocation by the Bishop of Capetown, who desired the opinion of the Houses for his guidance. In effect, it was answered that the Church of England is in communion with the Bishop of Capetown, but the Houses declined to say whether they were in communion with Dr. Colenso. They also held that the churchmen in Natal were entitled to elect a new bishop, and if they did so would still be in communion with the Church of England, if he were canonically ordained, and did not claim the title of Bishop of Natal. But they did not give any recommendation of such a course. The debates in both Houses were animated, but as the whole question was entangled with technical difficulties and doubts, the points that underwent discussion were not very definite. The interest of the discussions turned chiefly on the expression of sentiment by individual speakers. The Dean of Westminster elaborately went into the grounds on which Dr. Gray had pronounced sentence of excommunication against Dr. Colenso; and holding these grounds to be untenable, refused to regard Dr. Colenso as duly deposed from his office. To a large extent, he homologated his views; and he challenged his brethren not to direct their condemnation against one who was distant and friendless, and leave untouched such as himself because he was well-befriended and at hand.

During the meetings of the upper House of Convocation, the Bishop of Oxford presented to it a copy of a book, entitled "The Church and the World, or Essays upon the Questions of the Day." The Bishop of Salisbury expressed his admiration of the book. From this and other circumstances, it has acquired considerable notoriety. It is written by several writers, and is regarded as a manifesto of the extreme Ritualistic party, much as "Essays and Reviews" was of the extreme Broad Church. More strictly, the present volume might have been called "Essays and a Biography," for one of the papers is the autobiography of a lady who describes her life for thirty years in the English Church—she having begun as an Evangelical, swung to the opposite extreme, and been saved from being a pervert to Rome by the decree of the Synod of Exeter in the Gorham case! The judgment passed in the book on Broad Churchism, in its general, and especially its missionary influence, is very unfavourable. Of all sections of the Church, the Broad Churchman is regarded as the least missionary. He is more a man of the study than of the parish, ill-fitted to grapple with the terrible sufferings of awakened sinners and dying men. As for women and children, Broad Churchism is declared to be singularly ill-adapted for them. If Dr. Littledale, in his "Missionary Aspects of Ritualism," thus speaks out against the Broad Church, the lady attacks not less keenly the presumed faults of Evangelicals. Intellect, she says, is no longer found among them, and worldliness has sapped their earnestness. Bitter invective has taken the place of hard work, and conventional has succeeded to actual self-denial. A man may pamper himself and amass money, if only he does not go to the theatre. A woman may dress in the height of the fashion, play croquet, and flirt, if only she does not dance. While Broad Church and Evangelical are thus going all wrong, the Church of Rome is improving. It has far more than formerly "of the spirituality and fervour that changes ordinary Christianity into the first stage of saintliness. Prayer increases, and the direct and remarkable answers it receives almost justify the belief that before very long such answers will assume a more directly supernatural character." According to the old adage, "Fas est et ab hoste doceri," one may get good even from an enemy; and to those who are well instructed in the great foundations of their faith, even such strictures as those we have noticed may not be without some use.

A strenuous effort is about to be made to secure the letter-carriers over the country the enjoyment of the day of rest. A copy of the following letter has been sent to 11,000 clergymen and ministers in England and Wales by the Working Men's Lords'-day Rest Association:—"On behalf of 20,000 Post-office officials who are employed in the provinces on Sundays, we beg to solicit your co-operation in measures designed to bring about the discontinuance of the Sunday delivery of letters. In London, with its vast commerce and 3,000,000 inhabitants, and numerous other towns and villages in England and Scotland, there is no Sunday delivery of letters, and there is no good reason why the same rule should not be carried out in every town and village in the empire. But we cannot hope that the Sunday delivery of letters will be stopped until the public express their willingness to give the postmen the Sunday rest, by requesting that their own letters may not be delivered on Sundays. When this has been extensively done we trust that the way will be prepared for abolishing the Sunday deliveries entirely. We therefore hope that you will co-operate in the efforts now being made to induce persons throughout the country to sign the enclosed request for the non-delivery of their letters on Sundays. A return of the number of persons who have signed such request will be moved for in Parliament; we hope, therefore, that you will use your influence with your congregation and friends, to induce them to sign requests for their own letters not to be delivered on Sundays."

Whatever be the faults of the age, a disposition to shut the eyes to the condition of the poorer classes cannot be included in the number. Some interesting papers have appeared lately in the Quiver and in the Evening Star—devoted to some of those hotbeds of poverty and wretchedness of which London contains so many. It would be absolutely heartbreaking to read these narratives if one did not cherish the hope that they may serve to give an impulse to the agencies of Christian regeneration that are trying to grapple with such terrible evils. Whether it be "Kent Street, Borough," that is mirrored in the Quiver, or "Jack Ketch's Warren, Clerkenwell," that is explored in the Star, it is the same tale of overcrowding, filth, and misery, in the midst of which industry sometimes strives by incredible exertions to keep the wolf from the door, but more commonly yields the sceptre to drunkenness, theft, and debauchery. On the other hand, it is cheering to find that even in such dark recesses Christian light can penetrate, and Christian love prevail. We have before us an interesting little volume,—well adapted for the encouragement of all who are labouring in such districts—entitled "Chequer Alley: A Story of Successful Christian Work." It tells how, five-and-twenty years ago, Miss Macarthy, an intelligent Christian woman, earning her daily bread with her own hands, being suddenly filled with a sense of her obligations to the pardoning grace and love of God in Christ, began to visit a wild district called Chequer Alley—an irregular avenue leading from Bunhill Row to Whitecross Street, a haunt of crime and carelessness, peopled by creatures so sunk that it was difficult to recognise in them anything like mind. Through her quiet, devoted personal efforts, and the labours of others whom she was enabled to get interested in the district, a remarkable revival of religion occurred; a bright oasis was reclaimed in this dark desert, and added to the garden of the Lord. The discouragements at first were fearful, and anything like an attempt to hold a meeting, or to expound divine truth was met with such mockery, noise, and blasphemy, that ordinary workers would have been not only discouraged but appalled. The first great impression was made after a service in a room hired for the purpose, when Miss Macarthy and one or two female coadjutors asked the women to remain, that from their own experience they might tell them what was the meaning of conversion. They told them how they had been pierced by a sense of sin, and how, as they truthfully and confidingly looked to Jesus as their Saviour, and surrendered themselves to Him, the love of God was shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto them; and how, in a sense which they could not explain, their fellowship was now with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. The ladies then knelt down to pray; a strange sense of awe came over every mind. Strange sobbings and suppressed breathings began to be heard, and when the prayer ceased, twenty persons seemed stricken in heart, as on the Day of Pentecost, and were asking. "What must I do to be saved?" This was the commencement of the work of renovation. With the help and encouragement which the Wesleyan Church supplies, this group of converts were carried on in the divine life, and enabled to show that they had not received the grace of God in vain. The children, who were gathered into schools, were at first extremely troublesome, as such children often are. Once the teacher was fairly nonplussed. Every means of producing order failed. Every appeal to the children left them as boisterous as ever. In very despair the teacher involuntarily sunk on her knees to the floor, and began to implore the interposition of God himself—"Lord, whose I am and whom I serve, wilt thou be pleased to put forth Thy power on behalf of Thy helpless handmaid, and for the honour of Thy name?" While thus pleading the storm suddenly subsided; and retaining the attitude of prayer, she began to supplicate with increased fervour the bestowment then and there of the converting grace of God. There was perfect silence while she thus prayed; and not many moments after, she felt two little arms entwined round her neck, and heard, in broken accents, "Oh, teacher! I'se so wicked! Teacher, teacher, we will be good, we will be good!" Ever since the school has been a pattern of good conduct. Individual instances not a few have occurred, of a striking change of character and life; and though yet far from being a paradise, even the physical aspect of the district has undergone a change.

As the records of the month do not contain much that is very fresh or striking in connection with continental or mission fields, we shall devote the remainder of this paper to brief notices of a few of the religious publications that have lately appeared.

Dr. Merle D'Aubigné has just issued in English the fourth volume of his "Reformation in Europe in the time of Calvin." The contents of the volume are somewhat miscellaneous. The first part details the efforts of England to cast off the Papacy during the five years from 1529 to 1534; the scene then passes to Geneva, where a most animated contest is recorded that took place about the same period; and the last part is devoted to the early Reformation in Italy. In the portion relating to the Reformation in England, Dr. Merle D'Aubigné deals with the subject which has been recently treated by Mr. Froude. But while acknowledging the value of his volumes, he does not agree in his estimate of the character of Henry VIII. While he believes that Henry rendered great services to England as a king, he is not inclined, so far as his private character is concerned, to consider him a model prince, and his victims as criminals. He thinks that England requires now more than ever to study the Fathers of the Reformation in their writings, and to be animated by their spirit. The strange imaginations that are leading men astray towards scepticism and superstition are very insidious and terrible; but there is much comfort in the consideration that at no time has evangelical Christianity been more widely extended than in our days. "It has been asserted," he says, "that the Reformation entered England by a backdoor. Not so; it was the true door that was opened by the Christian brethren (who associated together to read to the people the Word of God.) Idly do men speak of Henry's passions, the intrigues of his courtiers, the parade of his ambassadors, the skill of his ministers, the complaisance of his clergy, and the vacillations of parliament; above all else there was something else, something better, in the thirst exhibited in this island for the Word of God, and the internal transformation accomplished in the convictions of a great number of its inhabitants. This it was that worked such a powerful revolution in British society." The origin of the English Church is thus described:—"Two opposing elements, the reforming literature of the people, and the almost absolute power of the king, combined in England to accomplish the legal reformation. In that singular island, these two rival forces were often seen acting together; the liberalism of the nation gaining certain victories, the despotism of the prince gaining others; king and people agreeing to make mutual concessions. In the midst of these compromises, the little evangelical flock, which had no voice in such matters, religiously preserved the treasure entrusted to it—the Word of God, truth, liberty, and Christian virtue. From all these elements sprang the Church of England. A strange Church some call it. Strange indeed, for there is none which corresponds so imperfectly in theory with the ideal of the Church, and perhaps none whose members work out with more power and grandeur the ends for which Christ has formed his kingdom."

In the field of Scriptural exposition, Dr. Candlish's forty-six lectures on the First Epistle of St. John furnish a favourable specimen of minute and elaborate explanation of the teaching of Holy Scripture, in the homiletical form. The character of St. John's writings seems remarkably suited to the penetrating and subtle intellect of Dr. Candlish, although, possibly, his very excess of acuteness may produce instances of failure as well as of success. The grand subjects of the epistle he believes to be: Fellowship with God in light; Fellowship with God in righteousness and righteous love; Fellowship with God triumphant over the World and its Prince. The volume abounds in passages of great fervour and deep spiritual insight; and if at times the elaboration, alike of thought and expression, seems excessive, and the heights to which the author soars are beyond the level of ordinary experience, the earnest reader will feel repaid by his many powerful delineations of the ways and workings of the human heart on the one hand, and the glorious grace of God on the other.

"The Critical English Testament," edited by Messrs. Blackley and Hawes, rests on the basis of the admirable Gnomon of Bengel, supplemented by notes from eminent critics both of this country and of Germany, showing the precise results of modern criticism and exegesis. The work of Bengel must have had remarkable merits to maintain its high place in public esteem for more than a hundred and twenty years; in the present issue the English reader will find all that is valuable in that great work, united with the most important contributions of modern critics towards the exposition of the sacred text. This compact and well printed volume contains the four Gospels, and will be followed by other two. It will be of much service to many English students of the New Testament.

"The Prophet Jonah: his Character and Mission to Nineveh," by the Rev. Hugh Martin, of Edinburgh, is an acute and able exposition of that interesting book of Scripture, and is marked by rare freshness and power. Two of the chapters having appeared in this Magazine, our readers may judge for themselves of the value and excellence of the completed work.

"Characteristics of Christ's Teaching, drawn from the Sermon on the Mount," by C. J. Vaughan, D.D., of Doncaster, presents the lessons of the greatest of sermons with all that tenderness, purity, and grace, which invariably mark the writings of Dr. Vaughan.

If we mention, among other expository books recently published, Dr. Rowland Williams' "Hebrew Prophets, Translated afresh from the Original," it is with a very different intention from that of commending the work of so unsound a writer; but rather to call attention to the great want of trustworthy commentaries on this very important portion of the Old Testament. In regard to the minor prophets, in particular, it is remarkable that while Dr. Pusey on the one hand, and Dr. Williams on the other, have recently devoted themselves to their elucidation, no recent divine of the Evangelical school has thrown much light on their many obscurities. Excepting the book of Jonah, they are almost virgin soil to such commentators; and it is very certain that to the majority of readers the minor prophets, as a whole, are little known. Most readers are content to recognise a nugget or a gem at the distance of half a chapter or so; as for understanding the scope of the writers, and getting the whole placed in a light that will make each verse a part of one harmonious whole, that is an achievement of which very few ever dream.

Dr. McCosh, of Belfast, in his reply to Mr. Mill's book on Sir William Hamilton's philosophy, has made another important contribution to the manifestation of the harmony of true philosophy and revelation.

The treatise, too metaphysical to be appreciated by the popular reader, is fitted to tell powerfully in the circle for which it is designed. Somewhat similar in design, but wider in its scope and more popular in its treatment, is Dr. Rigg's massive volume of "Essays for the Times." The author expresses his hope that it may assist in bringing Christian thinkers to an agreement on some of the pressing questions of the day. It deals with theology, philosophy, social progress, and popular education; but all the papers are directly concerned with the question of human progress, and they all recognise Christianity as furnishing the laws and the life out of which the progress of the world is continually to unfold itself. It is not often that a writer is to be found combining earnest spiritual sympathies and longings, with such breadth of culture and comprehensiveness of view, such varied learning, and such soundness of judgment, as are found in Dr. Rigg. We believe the volume to be eminently wholesome and valuable. Another man of eminence in the Wesleyan Church has given to the world a new treatise on Buddhism: "The Legends and Theories of the Buddhists, compared with History and Science. By R. Spence Hardy, Hon. M. R. I. S." As Mr. Spence Hardy has spent great part of his life in the region of Buddhism, he has had ample opportunity for gaining that acquaintance with the system which, in the judgment of such an eminent savant as M. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, makes his books storehouses of learning on the subject. The tendency that has shown itself among sceptical men at home to look with favour on Buddhism as a rival of Christianity, is opportunely met by the exposure in this, and the other works of Mr. Hardy, of the real nature and tendency of the system.

Turning to the field of general religious literature, our attention is arrested by a remarkable article in the Contemporary Review on "Recent Nonconformist Sermons." The sermons selected for review are those of Dr. Raleigh, Mr. Dale, Professor Reynolds, and the late Mr. Hull, of Lynn. Of all these preachers (some of them frequent contributors to this Magazine), the reviewer speaks with very high commendation, and his estimate is the more important that he writes as a Churchman and from a Churchman's point of view. Though the ground be somewhat delicate, we cannot think that we are trespassing beyond our proper limits in referring to the tone of Christian generosity in which the writer speaks of his Nonconformist brethren. Protesting against the arrogance that would despise, and the contempt that would ignore, any services not rendered within the pale of the Church, he says that the authors of such sermons are not men whom any portion of a Christian society ought to allow itself to treat with neglect. If men are to be known by their fruits, then the fruits which these volumes present reveal men that are not to be lightly esteemed or set aside. "And if it be thought that sound and wholesome words cannot properly be called fruits, let us examine the fruits of those words, and see whether we rightly estimate the work which those Churches are doing amongst us which lie outside the pale of Episcopacy. What spectacle in the history of nations has ever been nobler than the patience and loyalty of the great middle class of this country? And while we would not for one moment depreciate the blessed influence over that class of the Church and her parochial system, we have also a right to claim at least a considerable share of the influences which have made them what they are to the teaching of Nonconformist schools and pulpits. What would they have been had that teaching been in the direction of discontent and disloyalty? And then let it be remembered that these teachers are for the most part working in neglect and disrepute, as far as any recognition of their work by Churchmen is concerned." All honour to those who do not shrink from avowing these generous sentiments, strange though it be that there should be anything remarkable in the fact of their being expressed.

"Views of Faith. By Rev. A. L. R. Foote, author of 'Incidents in the Life of Our Saviour,'" is a book of great excellence and utility, the product of a mind alike devout, scriptural, and original, nowise bound to traditions as such, looking round on Scripture and on mankind with a free and fearless expression, yet most loyal to the grand doctrines of the Evangelical faith. "Easter-tide Sermons, preached before the University of Cambridge, by Henry Alford, D.D., Dean of Canterbury," may be said to have for their object the establishment and enforcement of the reality of the risen Saviour's existence as the Shepherd of his sheep, and of the fellowship of his people with Him; they are plain, earnest pleadings for living and confiding communion with Christ. "Lending a Hand; or, Help for the Working Classes. By the author of 'Doing and Suffering,'" is a useful compilation of facts and suggestions towards the solution of some of the vexed social questions of the day. "The Life of John Welch, by the late Rev. James Young," is a careful compilation of such facts as can now be got at in the history of one eminent in his day for prayerful earnestness, and well-known as the son-in-law of John Knox. "Scenes and Characters of a Scottish Pastorate, by J. R. McGavin, D.D., Dundee," is an interesting record of ministerial experiences, that would have been still more valuable if the style had been simpler. Among other books that have come under our notice, we can but direct attention to a volume of "Miscellaneous Discourses, by the Rev. Gavin Carlyle, M.A., editor of the 'Collected Writings of Edward Irving,'" indicating the excellent quality of the ministrations by which the author has built up a London congregation; and "The Lord's Portion stored on the Lord's Day, a Handbook of Sacred Finance, by John Ross, Hackney," whose views on the subject of Christian liberality, summed up in this little volume, have done much to make "giving" not only more abundant and more regular, but for that very cause, more cheerful also.

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

XXXII.

As I sat in my study in the twilight of that same day, the door was hurriedly opened, and Judy entered. She looked about the room with a quick glance to see that we were alone, then caught my hand in both of hers, and burst out crying.

"Why, Judy!" I said, "what is the matter?"

But the sobs would not allow her to answer. I was too frightened to put any more questions, and so stood silent—my chest feeling like an empty tomb that waited for death to fill it. At length with a strong effort she checked the succession of her sobs, and spoke.

"They are killing Auntie. She looks like a ghost already," said the child, again bursting into tears.

"Tell me, Judy, what can I do for her?"

"You must find out, Mr. Walton. If you loved her as much as I do, you would find out what to do."

"But she will not let me do anything for her."

"Yes, she will. She says you promised to help her some day."

"Did she send you, then?"

"No. She did not send me."

"Then how—what—what can I do?"

"Oh, you exact people! you must have everything square and in print before you move. If it had been me now, wouldn't I have been off like a shot! Do get your hat, Mr. Walton."

"Come, then, Judy. I will go at once.—Shall I see her?"

And every vein throbbed at the thought of rescuing her from her persecutors, though I had not yet the smallest idea how it was to be effected.

"We will talk about that as we go," said Judy, authoritatively.

In a moment more we were in the open air. It was a still night, with an odour of damp earth, and a hint of green buds in it. A pale half-moon hung in the sky, now and then hidden by the clouds that swept across it, for there was wind in the heavens, though upon earth all was still. I offered Judy my arm, but she took my hand, and we walked on without a word till we had got through the village and out upon the road.

"Now, Judy," I said at last; "tell me what they are doing to your aunt."

"I don't know what they are doing. But I am sure she will die."

"Is she ill?"

"She is as white as a sheet, and will not leave her room. Grannie must have frightened her dreadfully. Everybody is frightened at her but me, and I begin to be frightened too. And what will become of Auntie then?"

"But what can her mother do to her?"

"I don't know. I think it is her determination to have her own way that makes Auntie afraid she will get it somehow; and she says now she will rather die than marry Captain Everard. Then there is no one allowed to wait on her but Sarah, and I know the very sight of her is enough to turn Auntie sick almost. What has become of Jane I don't know. I haven't seen her all day, and the servants are whispering together more than usual. Auntie can't eat what Sarah brings her, I am sure; else I should almost fancy she was starving herself to death to keep clear of that Captain Everard."

"Is he still at the Hall?"

"Yes. But I don't think it is altogether his fault. Grannie won't let him go. I don't believe he knows how determined Auntie is not to marry him. Only, to be sure, though Grannie never lets her have more than five shillings in her pocket at a time, she will be worth something when she is married."

"Nothing can make her worth more than she is, Judy," I said, perhaps with some discontent in my tone.

"That's as you and I think, Mr. Walton; not as Grannie and the Captain think at all. I daresay he would not care much more than Grannie whether she was willing or not, so long as she married him."

"But, Judy, we must have some plan laid before we reach the Hall; else my coming will be of no use."

"Of course. I know how much I can do, and you must arrange the rest with her. I will take you to the little room up-stairs—we call it the Octagon. That you know is just under Auntie's room. They will be at dinner—the Captain and Grannie. I will leave you there, and tell Auntie that you want to see her."

"But, Judy——"

"Don't you want to see her, Mr. Walton?"

"Yes, I do; more than you can think."

"Then I will tell her so."

"But will she come to me?"

"I don't know. We have to find that out."

"Very well, I leave myself in your hands."

I was now perfectly collected. All my dubitation and distress were gone, for I had something to do, although what I could not yet tell. That she did not love Captain Everard was plain, and that she had as yet resisted her mother was also plain, though it was not equally certain that she would, if left at her mercy, go on to resist her. This was what I hoped to strengthen her to do. I saw nothing more within my reach as yet. But from what I knew of Miss Oldcastle, I saw plainly enough that no greater good could be done for her than this enabling to resistance. Self-assertion was so foreign to her nature, that it needed a sense of duty to rouse her even to self-defence. As I have said before, she was clad in the mail of endurance, but was utterly without weapons.

And there was a danger of her conduct and then of her mind giving way at last, from the gradual inroads of weakness upon the thews which she left unexercised. In respect of this, I prayed heartily that I might help her.

Judy and I scarcely spoke to each other from the moment we entered the gate till I found myself at a side door which I had never observed till now. It was fastened, and Judy told me to wait till she went in and opened it. The moon was now quite obscured, and I was under no apprehension of discovery. While I stood there I could not help thinking of Dr. Duncan's story, and reflecting that the daughter was now returning the kindness shown to the mother.

I had not to wait long before the door opened behind me noiselessly, and I stepped into the dark house. Judy took me by the hand, and led me along a passage, and then up a stair into the little drawing-room. There was no light. She led me to a seat at the further end, and opening a door close beside me, left me in the dark.

There I sat so long that I fell into a fit of musing, broken ever by startled expectation. Castle after castle I built up; castle after castle fell to pieces in my hands. Still she did not come. At length I got so restless and excited that only the darkness kept me from starting up and pacing the room. Still she did not come, and partly from weakness, partly from hope deferred, I found myself beginning to tremble all over. Nor could I control myself. As the trembling increased, I grew alarmed lest I should become unable to carry out all that might be necessary.

Suddenly from out of the dark a hand settled on my arm. I looked up and could just see the whiteness of a face. Before I could speak, a voice said brokenly, in a half-whisper:—

"Will you save me, Mr. Walton? But you're trembling; you are ill; you ought not to have come to me. I will get you something."

And she moved to go, but I held her. All my trembling was gone in a moment. Her words, so careful of me even in her deep misery, went to my heart and gave me strength. The suppressed feelings of many months rushed to my lips. What I said I do not know, but I know that I told her I loved her. And I know that she did not draw her hand from mine when I said so.

But ere I ceased came a revulsion of feeling.

"Forgive me," I said; "I am selfishness itself to speak to you thus now, to take advantage of your misery to make you listen to mine. But, at least, it will make you sure that if all I am, all I have will save you——"

"But I am saved already," she interposed, "if you love me, for I love you."

And for some moments there were no words to speak. I stood holding her hand, conscious only of God and her. At last I said:

"There is no time now but for action. Nor do I see anything but to come with me at once. Will you come home to my sister? Or I will take you wherever you please."

"I will go with you anywhere you think best. Only take me away."

"Put on your bonnet, then, and a warm cloak, and we will settle all about it as we go."

She had scarcely left the room when Mrs. Oldcastle came to the door.

"No lights here!" she said. "Sarah, bring candles, and tell Captain Everard, when he will join us, to come to the octagon room. Where can that little Judy be? The child gets more and more troublesome, I do think. I must take her in hand."

I had been in great perplexity how to let her know that I was there; for to announce yourself to a lady by a voice out of the darkness of her boudoir, or to wait for candles to discover you where she thought she was quite alone—neither is a pleasant way of presenting yourself to her consciousness. But I was helped out of the beginning into the middle of my difficulties, once more by that blessed little Judy. I did not know she was in the room till I heard her voice. Nor do I yet know how much she had heard of the conversation between her aunt and myself; for although I sometimes see her look roguish even now that she is a middle-aged woman with many children, when anything is said which might be supposed to have a possible reference to that night, I have never cared to ask her.

"Here I am, Grannie," said her voice. "But I won't be taken in hand by you or anyone else. I tell you that. So mind. And Mr. Walton is here, too, and Aunt Ethelwyn is going out with him for a long walk."

"What do you mean, you silly child?"

"I mean what I say," and, "Miss Judy speaks the truth," fell together from her lips and mine.

"Mr. Walton," began Mrs. Oldcastle, indignantly, "it is scarcely like a gentleman to come where you are not wanted——"

Here Judy interrupted her.

"I beg your pardon, Grannie, Mr. Walton was wanted—very much wanted. I went and fetched him."

But Mrs. Oldcastle went on.

"——and to be sitting in my room in the dark too!"

"That couldn't be helped, Grannie. Here comes Sarah with candles."

"Sarah," said Mrs. Oldcastle, "ask Captain Everard to be kind enough to step this way."

"Yes, ma'am," answered Sarah, with an untranslatable look at me as she set down the candles.

We could now see each other. Knowing words to be but idle breath, I would not complicate matters by speech, but stood silent, regarding Mrs. Oldcastle. She on her part did not flinch, but returned my look with one both haughty and contemptuous. In a few moments, Captain Everard entered, bowed slightly, and looked to Mrs. Oldcastle as if for an explanation. Whereupon she spoke, but to me.

"Mr. Walton," she said, "will you explain to Captain Everard to what we owe the unexpected pleasure of a visit from you?"

"Captain Everard has no claim to any explanation from me. To you, Mrs. Oldcastle, I would have answered, had you asked me, that I was waiting for Miss Oldcastle."

"Pray inform Miss Oldcastle, Judy, that Mr. Walton insists upon seeing her at once."

"That is quite unnecessary. Miss Oldcastle will be here presently."

Mrs. Oldcastle turned slightly livid with wrath. She was always white, as I have said: the change I can describe only by the word I have used, indicating a bluish darkening of the whiteness. She walked towards the door beside me. I stepped between her and it.

"Pardon me, Mrs. Oldcastle. That is the way to Miss Oldcastle's room. I am here to protect her."

Without saying a word she turned and looked at Captain Everard. He advanced with a long stride of determination. But ere he reached me, the door behind me opened, and Miss Oldcastle appeared in her bonnet and shawl, carrying a small bag in her hand. Seeing how things were, the moment she entered she put her hand on my arm, and stood fronting the enemy with me. Judy was on my right, her eyes flashing, and her cheek as red as a peony, evidently prepared to do battle à toute outrance for her friends.

"Miss Oldcastle, go to your room instantly, I command you," said her mother; and she approached as if to remove her hand from my arm. I put my other arm between her and her daughter.

"No, Mrs. Oldcastle," I said. "You have lost all a mother's rights by ceasing to behave like a mother. Miss Oldcastle will never more do anything in obedience to your commands, whatever she may do in compliance with your wishes."

"Allow me to remark," said Captain Everard, with attempted nonchalance, "that that is strange doctrine for your cloth."

"So much the worse for my cloth then," I answered, "and the better for yours if it leads you to act more honourably."

Still keeping himself entrenched in the affectation of a supercilious indifference, he smiled haughtily, and gave a look of dramatic appeal to Mrs. Oldcastle.

"At least," said that lady, "do not disgrace yourself, Ethelwyn, by leaving the house in this unaccountable manner at night and on foot. If you will leave the protection of your mother's roof, wait at least till to-morrow."

"I would rather spend the night in the open air than pass another under your roof, mother. You have been a strange mother to me—and Dorothy too!"

"At least, do not put your character in question by going in this unmaidenly fashion. People will talk to your prejudice—and Mr. Walton's too."

Ethelwyn smiled.—She was now as collected as I was, seeming to have cast off all her weakness. My heart was uplifted more than I can say.—She knew her mother too well to be caught by the change in her tone.

I had not hitherto interrupted her once when she took the answer upon herself, for she was not one to be checked when she chose to speak. But now she answered nothing, only looked at me, and I understood her, of course.

"They will hardly have time to do so, I trust, before it will be out of their power. It rests with Miss Oldcastle herself to say when that shall be."

As if she had never suspected that such was the result of her scheming, Mrs. Oldcastle's demeanour changed utterly. The form of her visage was altered. She made a spring at her daughter, and seized her by the arm.

"Then I forbid it," she screamed; "and I will be obeyed. I stand on my rights. Go to your room, you minx."

"There is no law human or divine to prevent her from marrying whom she will. How old are you, Ethelwyn?"

I thought it better to seem even cooler than I was.

"Twenty-seven," answered Miss Oldcastle.

"Is it possible you can be so foolish, Mrs. Oldcastle, as to think you have the slightest hold on your daughter's freedom? Let her arm go."

But she kept her grasp.

"You hurt me, mother," said Miss Oldcastle.

"Hurt you? you smooth-faced hypocrite! I will hurt you then!"

But I took Mrs. Oldcastle's arm in my hand, and she let go her hold.

"How dare you touch a woman?" she said.

"Because she has so far ceased to be a woman as to torture her own daughter."

Here Captain Everard stepped forward, saying,—

"The riot-act ought to be read, I think. It is time for the military to interfere."

"Well put, Captain Everard," I said. "Our side will disperse if you will only leave room for us to go."

"Possibly I may have something to say in the matter."

"Say on."

"This lady has jilted me."

"Have you, Ethelwyn?"

"I have not."

"Then, Captain Everard, you lie."

"You dare to tell me so?"

And he strode a pace nearer.

"It needs no daring. I know you too well; and so does another who trusted you and found you false as hell."

"You presume on your cloth, but——" he said, lifting his hand.

"You may strike me, presuming on my cloth," I answered; "and I will not return your blow. Insult me as you will, and I will bear it. Call me coward, and I will say nothing. But lay one hand on me to prevent me from doing my duty, and I knock you down—or find you more of a man than I take you for."

It was either conscience or something not so good that made a coward of him. He turned on his heel.

"I really am not sufficiently interested in the affair to oppose you. You may take the girl for me. Both your cloth and the presence of ladies protect your insolence. I do not like brawling where one cannot fight. You shall hear from me before long, Mr. Walton."

"No, Captain Everard, I shall not hear from you. You know you dare not write to me. I know that of you which, even on the code of the duellist, would justify any gentleman in refusing to meet you. Stand out of my way!"

I advanced with Miss Oldcastle on my arm. He drew back; and we left the room.

As we reached the door, Judy bounded after us, threw her arms round her aunt's neck, then round mine, kissing us both, and returned to her place on the sofa. Mrs. Oldcastle gave a scream, and sunk fainting on a chair. It was a last effort to detain her daughter and gain time. Miss Oldcastle would have returned, but I would not permit her.

"No," I said; "she will be better without you. Judy, ring the bell for Sarah."

"How dare you give orders in my house?" exclaimed Mrs. Oldcastle, sitting bolt upright in the chair, and shaking her fist at us. Then assuming the heroic, she added, "From this moment she is no daughter of mine. Nor can you touch one farthing of her money, sir. You have married a beggar after all."

"Thy money perish with thee!" I said, and repented the moment I had said it. It sounded like an imprecation, and I know I had no correspondent feeling; for, after all, she was the mother of my Ethelwyn. But the allusion to money made me so indignant, that the words burst from me ere I could consider their import.

The cool wind greeted us like the breath of God, as we left the house and closed the door behind us. The moon was shining from the edge of a vaporous mountain, which gradually drew away from her, leaving her alone in the midst of a lake of blue. But we had not got many paces from the house when Miss Oldcastle began to tremble violently, and could scarcely get along with all the help I could give her. Nor, for the space of six weeks did one word pass between us about the painful occurrences of that evening.

When we managed at last to reach the vicarage, I gave her in charge to my sister, with instructions to help her to bed at once, while I went for Dr. Duncan.

XXXIII.

I FOUND the old man seated at his dinner, which he left immediately when he heard that Miss Oldcastle needed his help. In a few words I told him, as we went, the story of what had befallen at the Hall, to which he listened with the interest of a boy reading a romance, asking twenty questions about the particulars which I hurried over. Then he shook me warmly by the hand, saying:—

"You have fairly won her, Walton, and I am as glad of it as I could be of anything I can think of. She is well worth all you must have suffered. This will at length remove the curse from that wretched family. You have saved her from perhaps even a worse fate than her sister's."

"I fear she will be ill, though," I said, "after all that she has gone through."

But I did not even suspect how ill she would be.

As soon as I heard Dr. Duncan's opinion of her, which was not very definite, a great fear seized upon me that I was destined to lose her after all. This fear, however, terrible as it was, did not torture me like the fear that had preceded it. I could oftener feel able to say, "Thy will be done" than I could before.

Dr. Duncan was hardly out of the house when Old Rogers arrived, and was shown into the study. He looked excited. I allowed him to tell out his story, which was his daughter's of course, without interruption. He ended by saying:—

"Now, sir, you really must do summat. This won't do in a Christian country. We aint aboard ship here with a nor'-easter a-walkin' the quarter-deck."

"There's no occasion, my dear old fellow, to do anything."

He was taken aback.

"Well, I don't understand you, Mr. Walton. You're the last man I'd have expected to hear argufy for faith without works. It's right to trust in God; but if you don't stand to your halliards, your craft 'll miss stays, and your faith 'll be blown out of the bolt-ropes in the turn of a marlinspike."

I suspect there was some confusion in the figure, but the old man's meaning was plain enough. Nor would I keep him in a moment more of suspense.

"Miss Oldcastle is in the house, Old Rogers," I said.

"What house, sir?" returned the old man, his gray eyes opening wider as he spoke.

"This house, to be sure."

I shall never forget the look the old man cast upwards, or the reality given to it by the ordinarily odd sailor-fashion of pulling his forelock, as he returned inward thanks to the Father of all for his kindness to his friend. And never in my now wide circle of readers shall I find one, the most educated and responsive, who will listen to my story with a more gracious interest than that old man showed as I recounted to him the adventures of the evening. There were few to whom I could have told them: to Old Rogers I felt that it was right and natural and dignified to tell the story even of my love's victory.

How then am I able to tell it to the world as now? I can easily explain the seeming inconsistency. It is not merely that I am speaking, as I have said before, from behind a screen, or as clothed in the coat of darkness of an anonymous writer; but I find that, as I come nearer and nearer to the invisible world, all my brothers and sisters grow dearer and dearer to me; I feel towards them more and more as the children of my Father in heaven; and although some of them are good children and some naughty children, some very lovable and some hard to love, yet I never feel that they are below me, or unfit to listen to the story even of my love, if they only care to listen; and if they do not care, there is no harm done, except they read it. Even should they, and then scoff at what seemed and seems to me the precious story, I have these defences: first, that it was not for them that I cast forth my precious pearls, for precious to me is the significance of every fact in my history—not that it is mine, for I have been only as clay in the hands of the potter, but that it is God's, who made my history as it seemed and was good to Him; and second, that even should they trample them under their feet, they cannot well get at me to rend me. And more, the nearer I come to the region beyond, the more I feel that in that land a man needs not shrink from uttering his deepest thoughts, inasmuch as he that understands them not will not therefore revile him.—"But you are not there yet. You are in the land in which the brother speaketh evil of that which he understandeth not."—True, friend; too true. But I only do as Dr. Donne did in writing that poem in his sickness, when he thought he was near to the world of which we speak: I rehearse now, that I may find it easier then.

"Since I am coming to that holy room,
Where, with the choir of saints for evermore,
I shall be made thy music, as I come,
I tune the instrument here at the door;
And what I must do then, think here before."

When Rogers had thanked God, he rose, took my hand, and said:—

"Mr. Walton, you will preach now. I thank God for the good we shall all get from the trouble you have gone through."

"I ought to be the better for it," I answered.

"You will be the better for it," he returned. "I believe I've allus been the better for any trouble as ever I had to go through with. I couldn't quite say the same for every bit of good luck I had; leastways, I consider trouble the best luck a man can have. And I wish you a good night, sir. Thank God! again."

"But, Rogers, you don't mean it would be good for us to have bad luck always, do you? You shouldn't be pleased at what's come to me now, in that case."

"No, sir; sartinly not."

"How can you say then that bad luck is the best luck?"

"I mean the bad luck that comes to us—not the bad luck that doesn't come. But you're right, sir. Good luck or bad luck's both best when He sends 'em, as He allus does. In fac', sir, there is no bad luck but what comes out o' the man hisself. The rest's all good."

But whether it was the consequence of a reaction from the mental strain I had suffered, or the depressing effect of Miss Oldcastle's illness coming so close upon the joy of winning her; or that I was more careless and less anxious to do my duty than I ought to have been—I greatly fear that Old Rogers must have been painfully disappointed in the sermons which I did preach for several of the following Sundays. He never even hinted at such a fact, but I felt it much myself. A man has often to be humbled through failure, especially after success. I do not clearly know how my failures worked upon me; but I think a man may sometimes get spiritual good without being conscious of the point of its arrival, or being able to trace the process by which it was wrought in him. I believe that my failures did work some humility in me, and a certain carelessness of outward success even in spiritual matters, so far as the success affected me, provided only the will of God was done in the dishonour of my weakness. And I think, but I am not sure, that soon after I approached this condition of mind, I began to preach better. But still I found for some time that however much the subject of my sermon interested me in my study or in the church or vestry on the Saturday evening; nay, even although my heart was full of fervour during the prayers and lessons; no sooner had I begun to speak than the glow died out of the sky of my thoughts; a dull clearness of the intellectual faculties took its place; and I was painfully aware that what I could speak without being moved myself was not the most likely utterance to move the feelings of those who only listened. Still a man may occasionally be used by the Spirit of God as the inglorious "trumpet of a prophecy" instead of being inspired with the life of the word, and hence speaking out of a full heart in testimony of that which he hath known and seen.

I hardly remember when or how I came upon the plan, but now, as often as I find myself in such a condition, I turn away from any attempt to produce a sermon; and, taking up one of the sayings of our Lord which He himself has said "are spirit and are life," I labour simply to make the people see in it what I see in it; and when I find that thus my own heart is warmed, I am justified in the hope that the hearts of some at least of my hearers are thereby warmed likewise.

But no doubt the fact that the life of Miss Oldcastle seemed to tremble in the balance, had something to do with those results of which I may have already said too much. My design had been to go at once to London and make preparation for as early a wedding as she would consent to; but the very day after I brought her home, life and not marriage was the question. Dr. Duncan looked very grave, and although he gave me all the encouragement he could, all his encouragement did not amount to much. There was such a lack of vitality about her! The treatment to which she had been for so long a time subjected had depressed her till life was nearly quenched from lack of hope. Nor did the sudden change seem able to restore the healthy action of what the old physicians called the animal spirits. Possibly the strong reaction paralysed their channels, and thus prevented her gladness from reaching her physical nature so as to operate on its health. Her whole complaint appeared in excessive weakness. Finding that she fainted after every little excitement, I left her for four weeks entirely to my sister and Dr. Duncan, during which time she never saw me; and it was long before I could venture to stay in her room more than a minute or two. But as the summer approached she began to show signs of reviving life, and by the end of May was able to be wheeled into the garden in a chair.

During her aunt's illness, Judy came often to the vicarage. But Miss Oldcastle was unable to see her any more than myself without the painful consequence which I have mentioned. So the dear child always came to me in the study, and through her endless vivacity infected me with some of her hope. For she had no fears whatever about her aunt's recovery.

I had had some painful apprehensions as to the treatment Judy herself might meet with from her grandmother, and had been doubtful whether I ought not to have carried her off as well as her aunt; but the first time she came, which was the next day, she set my mind at rest on that subject.

"But does your grannie know where you are come?" I had asked her.

"So well, Mr. Walton," she replied, "that there was no occasion to tell her. Why shouldn't I rebel as well as Aunt Wynnie, I wonder?" she added, looking archness itself.

"How does she bear it?"

"Bear what, Mr. Walton?"

"The loss of your aunt."

"You don't think Grannie cares about that, do you? She's vexed enough at the loss of Captain Everard. —Do you know, I think he had too much wine yesterday, or he wouldn't have made quite such a fool of himself."

"I fear he hadn't had quite enough to give him courage, Judy. I daresay he was brave enough once, but a bad conscience soon destroys a man's courage."

"Why do you call it a bad conscience, Mr. Walton? I should have thought that a bad conscience was one that would let a girl go on anyhow and say nothing about it to make her uncomfortable."

"You are quite right, Judy; that is the worst kind of conscience, certainly. But tell me, how does Mrs. Oldcastle bear it?"

"You asked me that already."

Somehow Judy's words always seem more pert upon paper than they did upon her lips. Her naïveté, the twinkling light in her eyes, and the smile flitting about her mouth, always modified greatly the expression of her words.

"—Grannie never says a word about you or Auntie either."

"But you said she was vexed: how do you know that?"

"Because ever since the Captain went away this morning, she won't speak a word to Sarah even."

"Are you not afraid of her locking you up some day or other?"

"Not a bit of it. Grannie won't touch me. And you shouldn't tempt me to run away from her like Auntie. I won't. Grannie is a naughty old lady, and I don't believe anybody loves her but me—not Sarah, I'm certain. Therefore I can't leave her, and I won't leave her, Mr. Walton, whatever you may say about her."

"Indeed, I don't want you to leave her, Judy."

And Judy did not leave her as long as she lived. And the old lady's love to that child was at least one redeeming point in her fierce character. No one can tell how much good it may have done her before she died—though but a few years passed before her soul was required of her. Before that time came, however, a quarrel took place between her and Sarah, which quarrel I incline to regard as a hopeful sign. And to this day Judy has never heard how her old grannie treated her mother. When she learns it now from these pages I think she will be glad that she did not know it before her death.

The old lady would see neither doctor nor parson; nor would she hear of sending for her daughter. The only sign of softening that she gave was that once she folded her grand-daughter in her arms and wept long and bitterly. Perhaps the thought of her dying child came back upon her, along with the reflection that the only friend she had was the child of that marriage which she had persecuted to dissolution.

XXXIV.

My reader will perceive that this part of my story is drawing to a close. It embraces but a brief period of my life, and I have plenty more behind not altogether unworthy of record. But the portions of any man's life most generally interesting are those in which, while the outward history is most stirring, it derives its chief significance from accompanying conflict within. It is not the rapid change of events, or the unusual concourse of circumstances that alone can interest the thoughtful mind; while, on the other hand, internal change and tumult can be ill set forth to the reader, save they be accompanied and in part, at least, occasioned by outward event capable of embodying and elucidating the things that are of themselves unseen. For man's life ought to be a whole; and not to mention the spiritual necessities of our nature—to leave the fact alone that a man is a mere thing of shreds and patches until his heart is united, as the Psalmist says, to fear the name of God—to leave these considerations aside, I say, no man's life is fit for representation as a work of art save in proportion as there has been a significant relation between his outer and inner life, a visible outcome of some sort of harmony between them. Therefore I chose the portion in which I had suffered most, and in which the outward occurrences of my own life had been most interesting, for the fullest representation; while I reserve for a more occasional and fragmentary record many things in the way of experience, thought, observation, and facts in the history both of myself and individuals of my flock, which admit of, and indeed require, a more individual treatment than would be altogether suitable to a continuous story. But before I close this part of my communications with those whom I count my friends, for till they assure me of the contrary I mean to flatter myself with considering my readers generally as such, I must gather up the ends of my thread, and dispose them in such a manner that they shall neither hang too loose, nor yet refuse length enough for what my friend Rogers would call splicing.

It was yet summer when Miss Oldcastle and I were married. It was to me a day awful in its gladness. She was now quite well, and no shadow hung upon her half-moon forehead. We went for a fortnight into Wales, and then returned to the vicarage and the duties of the parish, in which my wife was quite ready to assist me.

Perhaps it would help the wives of some clergymen out of some difficulties, and be their protection against some reproaches, if they would at once take the position with regard to the parishioners which Mrs. Walton took, namely, that of their servant, but not in her own right—in her husband's. She saw, and told them so, that the best thing she could do for them was to help me, that she held no office whatever in the parish, and they must apply to me when anything went amiss. Had she not constantly refused to be "a judge or a divider," she would have been constantly troubled with disputes too paltry to be referred to me, and which were the sooner forgotten that the litigants were not drawn on further and further into the desert of dispute by the mirage of a justice that could quench no thirst. Only when any such affair was brought before me, did she use her good offices to bring about a right feeling between the contending parties, generally next-door neighbours, and mostly women, who, being at home all day, found their rights clash in a manner that seldom happened with those that worked in the fields. Whatever her counsel could do, however, had full scope through me, who earnestly sought it. And whatever she gave the poor, she gave as a private person, out of her own pocket. She never administered the communion-offering—that is, after finding out, as she soon did, that it was a source of endless dispute between some of the recipients, who regarded it as their common property, and were never satisfied with what they received. This is the case in many country parishes, I fear. As soon as I came to know it, I simply told the recipients that, although the communion-offering belonged to them, yet the distribution of it rested entirely with me; and that I would distribute it neither according to their fancied merits nor the degree of friendship I felt for them, but according to the best judgment I could form as to their necessities; and if any of them thought these were underrated, they were quite at liberty to make a fresh representation of them to me; but that I, who knew more about their neighbours than it was likely they did, and was not prejudiced by the personal regards which they could hardly fail to be influenced by, was more likely than they were to arrive at an equitable distribution of the money—upon my principles if not on theirs. And at the same time I tried to show them that a very great part of the disputes in the world came from our having a very keen feeling of our own troubles, and a very dull feeling of our neighbour's; for if the case was reversed, and our neighbour's condition became ours, ten to one our judgment would be reversed likewise. And I think some of them got some sense out of what I said. But I ever found the great difficulty in my dealing with my people to be the preservation of the authority which was needful for service; for when the elder serve the younger—and in many cases it is not age that determines seniority—they must not forget that without which the service they offer will fail to be received as such by those to whom it is offered. At the same time they must ever take heed that their claim to authority be founded on the truth, and not on ecclesiastical or social position. Their standing in the church accredits their offer of service: the service itself can only be accredited by the Truth and the Lord of Truth, who is the servant of all.

But it cost both me and my wife some time and some suffering before we learned how to deport ourselves in these respects.

In the same manner she avoided the too near, because unprofitable, approaches of a portion of the richer part of the community. For from her probable position in time to come, rather than her position in time past, many of the fashionable people in the county began to call upon her—in no small degree to her annoyance, simply from the fact that she and they had so little in common. So, while she performed all towards them that etiquette demanded, she excused herself from the closer intimacy which some of them courted, on the ground of the many duties which naturally fell to the parson's wife in a country-parish like ours; and I am sure that long before we had gained the footing we now have, we had begun to reap the benefits of this mode of regarding our duty in the parish as one, springing from the same source, and tending to the same end. The parson's wife who takes to herself authority in virtue of her position, and the parson's wife who disclaims all connection with the professional work of her husband, are equally out of place in being parsons' wives. The one who refuses to serve denies her greatest privilege; the one who will be a mistress receives the greater condemnation. When the wife is one with her husband, and the husband is worthy, the position will soon reveal itself.

But there cannot be many clergymen's wives amongst my readers; and I may have occupied more space than reasonable with this "large discourse." I apologize, and, there is room to fear, go on to do the same again.

As I write I am seated in that little octagonal room overlooking the quarry, with its green lining of trees, and its deep central well. It is my study now. My wife is not yet too old to prefer the little room in which she thought and suffered so much, to any other, although the stair that leads to it is high and steep. Nor do I object to her preference because there is no ready way to reach it save through this: I see her the oftener. And although I do not like any one to look over my shoulder while I write—it disconcerts me somehow—yet the moment the sheet is finished and flung on the heap, it is her property, as the print, reader, is yours. I hear her step overhead now. She is opening her window. Now I hear her door close; and now her foot is on the stair.

"Come in, love. I have just finished another sheet. There it is. What shall I end the book with? What shall I tell the friends with whom I have been conversing so often and so long for the last thing ere for a little while I bid them good-bye?"

And Ethelwyn bends her smooth forehead—for she has a smooth forehead still, although the hair that crowns it is almost white—over the last few sheets; and while she reads, I will tell my readers one of the good things that come of being married. It is, that there is one face upon which the changes come without your seeing them; or rather, there is one face which you can still see the same through all the shadows which years have gathered and heaped upon it. No, stay; I have got a better way of putting it still: there is one face whose final beauty you can see the more clearly as the bloom of youth departs, and the loveliness of wisdom and the beauty of holiness take its place; for in it you behold all that you loved before, veiled, it is true, but glowing with added brilliance under the veil ("Stop one moment, my dear") from which it will one day shine out like the moon from under a cloud, when a stream of the upper air floats it from off her face.

"Now, Ethelwyn, I am ready. What shall I write about next?"

"I don't think you have told them anywhere about Tom."

"No more I have. I meant to do so. But I am ashamed of it."

"The more reason to tell it."

"You are quite right. I will go on with it at once. But you must not stand there behind me. When I was a child, I could always confess best when I hid my face with my hands."

"Besides," said Ethelwyn, without seeming to hear what I said, "I do not want to have people saying that the vicar has made himself out so good that nobody can believe in him."

"That would be a great fault in my book, Ethelwyn. What does it come from in me? Let me see. I do not think I want to appear better than I am; but it sounds hypocritical to make merely general confessions, and it is indecorous to make particular ones. Besides, I doubt if it is good to write much about bad things even in the way of confession——"

"Well, well, never mind justifying it," said Ethelwyn. "I don't want any justification. But here is a chance for you. The story, will, I think, do good and not harm. You had better tell it, I do think. So if you are inclined, I will go away at once, and let you go on without interruption. You will have it finished before dinner, and Tom is coming, and you can tell him what you have done."

So, reader, now my wife has left me, I will begin. It shall not be a long story.

As soon as my wife and I had settled down at home, and I had begun to arrange my work again, it came to my mind that for a long time I had been doing very little for Tom Weir. I could not blame myself much for this, and I was pretty sure neither he nor his father blamed me at all; but I now saw that it was time we should recommence something definite in the way of study. When he came to my house the next morning, and I proceeded to acquaint myself with what he had been doing, I found to my great pleasure that he had made very considerable progress both in Latin and Mathematics, and I resolved that I would now push him a little. I found this only brought out his mettle; and his progress, as it seemed to me, was extraordinary. Nor was this all. There were such growing signs of goodness in addition to the uprightness which had first led to our acquaintance, that although I carefully abstained from making the suggestion to him, I was more than pleased when I discovered, from some remark he made, that he would gladly give himself to the service of the Church. At the same time I felt compelled to be the more cautious in anything I said, from the fact that the prospect of the social elevation which would be involved in the change might be a temptation to him, as no doubt it has been to many a man of humble birth. However, as I continued to observe him closely, my conviction was deepened that he was rarely fitted for ministering to his fellows; and soon it came to speech between his father and me, when I found that Thomas, so far from being unfavourably inclined to the proposal, was prepared to spend the few savings of his careful life upon his education. To this, however, I could not listen, because there was his daughter Mary, who was very delicate, and his grandchild too, for whom he ought to make what little provision he could. I therefore took the matter in my own hands, and by means of a judicious combination of experience and what money I could spare, I managed, at less expense than most parents suppose to be unavoidable, to maintain my young friend at Oxford till such time as he gained a fellowship. I felt justified in doing so in part from the fact that some day or other Mrs. Walton would inherit the Oldcastle property, as well as come into possession of certain monies of her own, now in the trust of her mother and two gentlemen in London, which would be nearly sufficient to free the estate from incumbrance, although she could not touch it as long as her mother lived and chose to refuse her the use of it, at least without a law-suit, with which neither of us was inclined to have anything to do. But I did not lose a penny by the affair. For of the very first money Tom received after he had got his fellowship, he brought the half to me, and continued to do so until he had repaid me every shilling I had spent upon him. As soon as he was in deacon's orders, he came to assist me for a while as curate, and I found him a great help and comfort. He occupied the large room over his father's shop which had been his grandfather's: he had been dead for some years.

I was now engaged on a work which I had been contemplating for many years, upon the development of the love of Nature as shown in the earliest literature of the Jews and Greeks, through that of the Romans, Italians, and other nations, with the Anglo-Saxon for a fresh starting-point, into its latest forms in Gray, Thomson, Cowper, Crabbe, Wordsworth, Keats, and Tennyson; and Tom supplied me with much of the time which I bestowed upon this object, and I was really grateful to him. But, in looking back, and trying to account to myself for the snare into which I fell, I see plainly enough that I thought too much of what I had done for Tom, and too little of the honour God had done me in allowing me to help Tom. I took the high-daïs-throne over him, not consciously I believe, but still with a contemptible condescension, not of manner but of heart, so delicately refined by the innate sophistry of my selfishness, that the better nature in me called it only fatherly friendship, and did not recognize it as that abominable thing so favoured of all those that especially worship themselves. But I abuse my fault instead of confessing it.

One evening, a gentle tap came to my door, and Tom entered. He looked pale and anxious, and there was an uncertainty about his motions which I could not understand.

"What is the matter, Tom?" I asked.

"I wanted to say something to you, sir," answered Tom.

"Say on," I returned, cheerily.

"It is not so easy to say, sir," rejoined Tom, with a faint smile. "Miss Walton, sir——"

"Well, what of her? There's nothing happened to her. She was here a few minutes ago—though, now I think of it——"

Here a suspicion of the truth flashed on me, and struck me dumb. I am now covered with shame to think how, when the thing approached myself on that side, it swept away for the moment all my fine theories about the equality of men in Christ their Head. Could Tom Weir, whose father was a joiner, who had been a lad in a London shop himself, dare to think of marrying my sister? Instead of thinking of what he really was, my regard rested upon this and that stage through which he had passed to reach his present condition. In fact, I regarded him rather as of my making than of God's.

Perhaps it might do something to modify the scorn of all classes for those beneath them, to consider that, by regarding others thus, they justify those above them in looking down upon them in their turn. In London shops, I am credibly informed, the young women who serve in the show-rooms, or behind the counters, are called ladies, and talk of the girls who make up the articles for sale as persons. To the learned professions, however, the distinction between the shop-women and milliners is, from their superior height, unrecognizable; while doctors and lawyers are again, I doubt not, massed by countesses and other blue-blooded realities, with the literary lions who roar at soirées and kettle-drums, or even with chiropodists and violin-players! But I am growing scornful at scorn, and forget that I too have been scornful. Brothers, sisters, all good men and true women, let the Master seat us where He will. Until he says, "Come up higher," let us sit at the foot of the board, or stand behind, honoured in waiting upon his guests. All that kind of thing is worth nothing in the kingdom; and nothing will be remembered of us but the Master's judgment.

I have known a good churchwoman who would be sweet as a sister to the abject poor, but offensively condescending to a shopkeeper or a dissenter, exactly as if he was a Pariah, and she a Brahmin. I have known good people who were noble and generous towards their so-called inferiors and full of the rights of the race—until it touched their own family, and just no longer. Yea I, who had talked like this for years, at once, when Tom Weir wanted to marry my sister, lost my faith in the broad lines of human distinction, judged according to appearances in which I did not even believe, and judged not righteous judgment.

"For," reasoned the World in me, "is it not too bad to drag your wife in for such an alliance? Has she not lowered herself enough already? Has she not married far below her accredited position in society? Will she not feel injured by your family if she see it capable of forming such a connexion?"

What answer I returned to Tom I hardly know. I remember that the poor fellow's face fell, and that he murmured something which I did not heed. And then I found myself walking in the garden under the great cedar, having stepped out of the window almost unconsciously, and left Tom standing there alone. It was very good of him even to forgive me.

Wandering about in the garden, my wife saw me from her window, and met me as I turned a corner in the shrubbery.

And now I am going to have my revenge upon her in a way she does not expect, for making me tell the story: I will tell her share in it.

"What is the matter with you, Henry?" she asked.

"Oh, not much," I answered. "Only that Weir has been making me rather uncomfortable."

"What has he been doing?" she inquired, in some alarm. "It is not possible he has done anything wrong."

My wife trusted him as much as I did.

"No—o—o," I answered. "Not anything exactly wrong."

"It must be very nearly wrong, Henry, to make you look so miserable."

I began to feel ashamed already.

"He has been falling in love with Martha," I said; "and when I put one thing to another, I fear he may have made her in love with him too."

My wife laughed merrily.

"What a wicked curate!"

"Well, but you know it is not exactly agreeable."

"Why?"

"You know why well enough."

"At least, I am not going to take it for granted. Is he not a good man?"

"Yes."

"Is he not a well-educated man?"

"As well as myself—for his years."

"Is he not clever?"

"One of the cleverest fellows I ever met."

"Is he not a gentleman?"

"I have not a fault to find with his manners."

"Nor with his habits?"

"No."

"Nor with his ways of thinking?"

"No.—But, Ethelwyn, you know what I mean quite well. His family, you know."

"Well, is his father not a respectable man?"

"Oh, yes, certainly. Thoroughly respectable."

"He wouldn't borrow money of his tailor instead of paying for his clothes, would he?"

"Certainly not."

"And if he were to die to-day he would carry no debts to heaven with him?"

"I believe not."

"Does he bear false witness against his neighbour?"

"No. He scorns a lie as much as any man I ever knew."

"Which of the Commandments is it in particular that he breaks, then?"

"None that I know of; excepting that no one can keep them yet that is only human. He tries to keep every one of them, I do believe."

"Well, I think Tom very fortunate in having such a father. I wish my mother had been as good."

"That is all true, and yet——"

"And yet, suppose a young man you liked had had a fashionable father who had ruined half a score of tradespeople by his extravagance—would you object to him because of his family?"

"Perhaps not."

"Then, with you, position outweighs honesty—in fathers, at least."

To this I was not ready with an answer, and my wife went on.

"It might be reasonable if you did though, from fear lest he should turn out like his father.—But do you know why I would not accept your offer of taking my name when I should succeed to the property?"

"You said you liked mine better."

"So I did. But I did not tell you that I was ashamed that my good husband should take a name which for centuries had been borne by hard-hearted, worldly-minded people, who, to speak the truth of my ancestors to my husband, were neither gentle nor honest, nor high-minded."

"Still, Ethelwyn, you know there is something in it, though it is not so easy to say what. And you avoid that. I suppose Martha has been talking you over to her side."

"Harry," my wife said, with a shade of solemnity, "I am almost ashamed of you for the first time. And I will punish you by telling you the truth. Do you think I had nothing of that sort to get over when I began to find that I was thinking a little more about you than was quite convenient under the circumstances? Your manners, dear Harry, though irreproachable, just had not the tone that I had been accustomed to. There was a diffidence about you also that did not at first advance you in my regard."

"Yes, yes," I answered, a little piqued, "I dare say. I have no doubt you thought me a boor."

"Dear Harry!"

"I beg your pardon, wifie. I know you didn't. But it is quite bad enough to have brought you down to my level, without sinking you still lower."

"Now there you are wrong, Harry. And that is what I want to show you. I found that my love to you would not be satisfied with making an exception in your favour. I must see what force there really was in the notions I had been bred in."

"Ah!" I said. "I see. You looked for a principle in what you had thought was an exception."

"Yes," returned my wife; "and I soon found one. And the next step was to throw away all false judgment in regard to such things. And so I can see more clearly than you into the right of this matter. —Would you hesitate a moment between Tom Weir and the dissolute son of an earl, Harry?"

"You know I would not."

"Well, just carry out the considerations that suggests, and you will find that where there is everything personally noble, pure, simple, and good, the lowliness of a man's birth is but an added honour to him; for it shows that his nobility is altogether from within him, and therefore is his own. It cannot then have been put on him by education or imitation, as many men's manners are, who wear their good breeding like their fine clothes, or as the Pharisee his prayers, to be seen of men."

"But his sister?"

"Harry, Harry! You were preaching last Sunday about the way God thinks of things. And you said that was the only true way of thinking about them. Would the Mary that poured the ointment on Jesus' head have refused to marry a good man because he was the brother of that Mary who poured it on his feet? Have you thought what God would think of Tom for a husband to Martha?"

I did not answer, for conscience had begun to speak. When I lifted my eyes from the ground, thinking Ethelwyn stood beside me, she was gone. I felt as if she were dead, to punish me for my pride. But still I could not get over it, though I was ashamed to follow and find her. I went and got my hat instead, and strolled out.

What was it that drew me towards Thomas Weir's shop? I think it must have been incipient repentance —a feeling that I had wronged the man. But just as I turned the corner, and the smell of the wood reached me, the picture so often associated in my mind with such a scene of human labour, rose before me. I saw the Lord of Life bending over his bench, fashioning some lowly utensil for some housewife of Nazareth. And he would receive payment for it too; for he at least could see no disgrace in the order of things that his Father had appointed. It is the vulgar mind that looks down on the earning and worships the inheriting of money. How infinitely more poetic is the belief that our Lord did his work like any other honest man, than that straining after his glorification in the early centuries of the Church by the invention of fables even to the disgrace of his father! They say that Joseph was a bad carpenter, and our Lord had to work miracles to set the things right which he had made wrong! To such a class of mind as invented these fables do those belong who think they honour our Lord when they judge anything human too common or too unclean for Him to have done.

And the thought sprung up at once in my mind— "If I ever see our Lord face to face, how shall I feel if He says to me, 'Didst thou do well to murmur that thy sister espoused a certain man for that in his youth he had earned his bread as I earned mine? Where was then thy right to say unto me, Lord, Lord?'"

I hurried into the workshop.

"Has Tom told you about it?" I said.

"Yes, sir. And I told him to mind what he was about; for he was not a gentleman, and you was, sir."

"I hope I am. And Tom is as much a gentleman as I have any claim to be."

Thomas Weir held out his hand.

"Now, sir, I do believe you mean in my shop what you say in your pulpit; and there is one Christian in the world at least.—But what will your good lady say? She's higher-born than you—no offence, sir."

"Ah, Thomas, you shame me. I am not so good as you think me. It was my wife that brought me to reason about it."

"God bless her."

"Amen. I'm going to find Tom."

At the same moment Tom entered the shop, with a very melancholy face. He started when he saw me, and looked confused.

"Tom, my boy," I said, "I behaved very badly to you. I am sorry for it. Come back with me, and have a walk with my sister. I don't think she'll be sorry to see you."

His face brightened up at once, and we left the shop together. Evidently with a great effort Tom was the first to speak.

"I know, sir, how many difficulties my presumption must put you in."

"Not another word about it, Tom. You are blameless. I wish I were. If we only act as God would have us, other considerations may look after themselves—or, rather, He will look after them. The world will never be right till the mind of God is the measure of things, and the will of God the law of things. In the kingdom of Heaven nothing else is acknowledged. And till that kingdom come, the mind and will of God must, with those that look for that kingdom, over-ride every other way of thinking, feeling, and judging. I see it more plainly than ever I did. Take my sister, in God's name, Tom, and be good to her."

Tom went to find Martha, and I to find Ethelwyn.

"It is all right," I said, "even to the shame I feel at having needed your reproof."

"Don't think of that. God gives us all time to come to our right minds, you know," answered my wife.

"But how did you get on so far a-head of me, wifie?"

Ethelwyn laughed.

"Why," she said, "I only told you back again what you have been telling me for the last seven or eight years."

So to me the message had come first, but my wife had answered first with the deed.

And now I have had my revenge on her.

Next to her and my children, Tom has been my greatest comfort for many years. He is still my curate, and I do not think we shall part till death part us for a time. My sister is worth twice what she was before, though they have no children. We have many, and they have taught me much.

Thomas Weir is now too old to work any longer. He occupies his father's chair in the large room of the old house. The workshop I have had turned into a schoolroom, of the external condition of which his daughter takes good care, while a great part of her brother Tom's time is devoted to the children; for he and I agree that, where it can be done, the pastoral care ought to be at least equally divided between the sheep and the lambs. For the sooner the children are brought under right influences—I do not mean a great deal of religious speech, but the right influences of truth and honesty, and an evident regard to what God wants of us—not only are they the more easily wrought upon, but the sooner do they recognize those influences as right and good. And while Tom quite agrees with me that there must not be much talk about religion, he thinks that there must be just the more acting upon religion; and that if it be everywhere at hand in all things taught and done, it will be ready to show itself to every one who looks for it. And besides that action is more powerful than speech in the inculcation of religion, Tom says there is no such corrective of sectarianism of every kind as the repression of speech and the encouragement of action.

Besides being a great help to me and everybody else almost in Marshmallows, Tom has distinguished himself in the literary world; and when I read his books, I am yet prouder of my brother-in-law. I am only afraid that Martha is not good enough for him. But she certainly improves, as I have said already.

Jane Rogers was married to young Brownrigg about a year after we were married. The old man is all but confined to the chimney-corner now, and Richard manages the farm, though not quite to his father's satisfaction, of course. But they are doing well notwithstanding. The old mill has been superseded by one of new and rare device, built by Richard; but the old cottage where his wife's parents lived has slowly mouldered back to the dust.

For the old people have been dead for many years. Often in the summer days as I go to or come from the vestry, I sit down for a moment on the turf that covers my old friend, and think that every day is mouldering away this body of mine till it shall fall a heap of dust into its appointed place. But what is that to me? It is to me the drawing nigh of the fresh morning of life, when I shall be young and strong again, glad in the presence of the wise and beloved dead, and unspeakably glad in the presence of my God, which I have now, but hope to possess far more hereafter.

I will not take a solemn leave of my friends just yet. For I hope to hold a little more communion with them ere I go hence. I know that my mental faculty is growing weaker, but some power yet remains; and I say to myself, "Perhaps this is the final trial of your faith—to trust in God to take care of your intellect for you, and to believe, in weakness, the truths He revealed to you in strength. Remember that Truth depends not upon your seeing it, and believe as you saw when your sight was at its best. For then you saw that the Truth was beyond all you could see." Thus I try to prepare for dark days that may come, but which cannot come without God in them.

And meantime I hope to be able to communicate some more of the good things experience and thought have taught me, and it may be some more of the events that have befallen my friends and myself in our pilgrimage. So, kind readers, God be with you. That is the older and better form of Good-bye.

THE ENGLISH HYMNS OF THE ELIZABETHAN ERA.

CONCLUDING ARTICLE.

Few of the hymns of the Elizabethan era live in our knowledge, and fewer still in our affections. On the whole they are Divine poems rather than hymns, and as such are to be judged rather by the intellect than by the heart. There is something hard and unloving about them, and the voices in which they speak have a strange unfamiliar sound. The Ambrosian Midnight Hymn, "Hark! 'tis the midnight cry," stirs the Christian heart after a lapse of fourteen centuries, and the hymns of the two Bernards of the twelfth century* are living tones in the Church of the nineteenth century, with power to thrill living hearts. The Latin hymn-writers being dead, yet speak. But Spenser's fine "Hymn to the Saviour," Gascoigne's morning and evening hymns, and the various sacred verses by Ben Jonson, Shirley, Wotton, Withers, Herrick, and others, are more like fossilised specimens of a religious life wherewith we have little kinship, than tongues singing of our own faith in our own language. The hymns which make our church-roofs ring, which soothe the sick-beds of princes and peasants, which come like true "singing angels," bringing peace when flesh and heart fail, and falter forth from dying lips wherever our tongue is spoken, were not indited by the mighty masters of verse, but by humbler men, whose songs gushed warm from hearts which the love of Jesus had touched. To such in all ages the Church has decreed the crown of sacred song. Aloof as the Elizabethan hymns are from the religious life of our own day, it is hard to conceive of them as having been even in their own the property ofany but an educated few. Their doctrine was laboriously orthodox, but their manner was as fantastic as that of the hymns of the later monkish hymn-writers. The specimens which are hereafter offered are chosen for their fine old English, their condensed thought, and the remarkable quaintness of their fancy, but the best of them could never have come home to the hearts of the people.

The first place belongs as of right to the gifted author of the "Faery Queen." Privileged beyond most men of genius of his day to reap cotemporary fame, his death of a broken heart in poverty and obscurity, followed by the splendid funeral in Westminster Abbey, when all the cotemporary poets threw tributary verses into his grave, give a mournful interest to the "Divine Poems" of Edmund Spenser. His hymn on the ministry of angels, beginning, "And is there care in heaven and is there love?" is now to be found in so many collections, that a less-known specimen, from his "Hymn to the Saviour," is selected. The first two and the last out of eighteen stanzas are given :—

HYMN TO THE SAVIOUR.

"O blessed Well of Love! O Flower of Grace!
O glorious Morning Star! O Lamp of Light!
Most lively image of thy Father's face,
Eternal King of Glorie, Lord of Might,
Meek Lamb of God before all worlds behight,
How can Thee we requite for all this good?
Or what can prize that Thy most precious blood?

"Yet nought Thou ask'st in lieu of all this love
But love of us for guerdon of Thy pain;
Ay me! what can us less than that behove?
Had He required life from us again,
Had it been wrong to ask his own with gain?
He gave us life: He it restored lost;
Then life were least, that us so little cost."

This hymn continues by an elaborate eulogy of the freedom purchased for us by Christ's blood, for which we are to testify our gratitude, first by loving Him, and next those who are with "the self-same price redeemed." Spenser then addresses the earth, "wallowing like to swine" in base pleasures, all unmindful of the Cross of Christ, and traces his history from Bethlehem to Calvary, urging "the flinty heart," by the sight of the agonies of the Redeemer, to repentance and faith. He expatiates on "the expulsive power" of the new-born love of Christ, and represents how the soul, being inflamed by it, dies to all earthly things, counting all but loss that it may win Christ and be found in Him. The hymn concludes thus :—

"Then shall thy ravished soul inspired be
With heavenly thoughts, far above human skill,
And thy bright radiant eyes shall plainly see
Th' idea of His pure glorie present still Before thy face, that all thy soul shall fill
With sweet enragement of celestial love,
Kindled through sight of those fair things above."

In spite of the formality of this hymn, there is a tenderness in its statements of truth which may commend it to the student of our early hymns, and the fame of Spenser renders it worthy of perusal. It is a specimen of the simple and orthodox style of hymn-writing before the Emblematists had exercised the public ingenuity and perverted the public taste.

Of that galaxy of great men which lent lustre to Elizabeth's reign, the most brilliant luminary was Sir Walter Raleigh, "soldier, courtier, sailor, scholar, orator, poet, philosopher, hero." From the commencement of his military career at the age of seventeen, to the day when he laid his head calmly upon the block, his life is one bewitching story of romance and vicissitude, linking the eclectic cultivation of the modern with the poetic chivalry of the middle ages, by a spirit of romantic adventure peculiar to itself. He was rather a man of a roving and daring spirit than of poetic contemplation, but his imagination was very brilliant, and in that long and dreary leisure of imprisonment, in which the fire of his erratic hopes and ambitions was extinguished, he learned to express himself with combined felicity of language and vigour of thought. Whatever may now be thought of his sonnets and other poems, they were greatly admired in his own day, and his poetic genius received the homage of no less a poet than Spenser. Raleigh, dazzling, brilliant, rich, prosperous, the idol of a Court, the favourite of a queen, with nothing left him to conquer but that restless ambition which finally "overleapt itself," claims less of our interest than Raleigh disgraced, imprisoned, deserted, learning in the quiet eventide of his too tempestuous life that "whoso drinketh of this water shall thirst again." The hymn which follows (supposed to have been written by him in 1603, in the interval between his condemnation and his respite), a letter to his wife, and a few lines written by him in his Bible twelve years afterwards, on the evening before his execution, encourage the hope that this brilliant but unfortunate adventurer had learned to drink of that water of which "whoso drinketh shall never thirst."

* "Jesus, Thou joy of loving hearts," St. Bernard.—"Brief life is here our portion," Bernard de Morlaix.

MY PILGRIMAGE.

"Give me my scallop-shell of quiet,
My staff of faith to walk upon,
My scrip of joy (immortal diet),
My bottle of salvation,
My gown of glory, hope's true gage—
And thus I take my pilgrimage.
No cause deferred, no vain spent journey,
For there Christ is the King's attorney;
Who pleads for all without degrees,
And He hath angels but no fees;
And when the grand twelve million jury
Of our sins with direful fury
'Gainst our souls black verdicts give,
Christ pleads His death and then we live.
Be Thou my speaker, taintless Pleader,
Unblotted Lawyer, true Proceeder:
Thou giv'st salvation even for alms,
Not with a bribed lawyer's palms,
And this is my eternal plea
To Him who made heaven, earth, and sea.

Blood must be my body's balmer,
While my soul like faithful palmer
Travelleth towards the land of heaven:
Other balm will not be given.

Over the silver mountains,
Where spring the nectar fountains,
There will I kiss
The bowl of bliss,
And drink my everlasting fill
Upon every milken hill:
My soul will be a-dry before,
But after that will thirst no more."

WALTER RALEIGH.

Although there lurks in this quaint hymn something of the bitterness of a man who felt himself unjustly condemned by an earthly tribunal, there is the same clear appreciation of the way of salvation by the death of "the just for the unjust," which distinguished nearly all the Elizabethan hymns. Fifteen years afterwards when the brilliant courtier had again been tempted and betrayed by ambition, and found himself once more within those prison walls which for his soul's sake it had been better he had never left, he composed the following lines, and wrote them in his Bible on the last night of his life in the little room over the gatehouse. They were much prized in that day, and though there is a taint of the gloom of his earlier days about them, we may believe that it was in humble hope of a resurrection unto life, through the death and atonement of "the taintless Pleader," that Raleigh laid his head upon the block a few hours afterwards with the words, "This is a sharp medicine, but a sound cure for all diseases."

"When such is time, that takes on trust
Our youth, our joy, and all we have,
And pays us but with earth and dust:
Who in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days:—
But from this earth, this grave, this dust,
My God shall raise me up, I trust."

Sir Henry Wotton deserves a brief notice, as two of his hymns are found in many of our collections. He would have been remembered for his humorous definition of an ambassador—"An honest gentleman sent to lie abroad for the good of his country,"—and for his advice to Milton, whose Comus received from him an enthusiasm of praise which does him great credit, rather than for his works and character, had not Isaak Walton embalmed him in one of his quaint tender biographies. A keen vision for political omens seems to have made and kept his fortune. While Essex was in favour with Elizabeth, Wotton was attached to his service, but his sagacity in descrying the signs of the favourite's coming downfall saved him from sharing it. Again he scented out and divulged to James I. a conspiracy formed against him while king of Scotland, for which James, on ascending the English throne, appointed him ambassador to Venice. After a career of success as a courtier he took orders in the Church of England to qualify himself for the provostship of Eton, and some of his hymns give the impression that he found the true riches, although they are marked by the prevailing dryness and formality of the period.

A MEDITATION.

"Oh thou great Power! in whom we move,
By whom we live, to whom we die,
Behold me through thy beams of love
Whilst on this couch of tears I lie,
And cleanse my sordid soul within
By thy Christ's blood, the bath of sin.

No hallowed oils, no gums I need,
No new-born drams of purging fire,
One rosy drop from David's seed
Was worlds of zeal to quench thine ire.
O, precious ransom! which, once paid,
That consummatum est was said,

And said by Him that said no more,
But sealed it with his sacred breath.
Thou then that hast dispurged our score
And dying wert the death of death,
Be now, while on thy name we call,
Our Life, our Strength, our Joy, our All."

This hymn, which was a great favourite of Charles I., and another, beginning, "Farewell, ye gilded follies, pleasing troubles," are the best known of Wotton's hymns, but by far his finest composition is one beginning,

"How happy is he born and taught
Who serveth not another's will."

Wotton left behind him the reputation of being "an easy, amiable man, an angler, and an undervaluer of money." We would desire something more for the epitaph of a hymn-writer, but on the whole the popular sacred poets of that day were not men of eminent piety.

The following hymn is by Bishop H. King, well known in his day as one of the most refined of religious poets. In his earlier years he was chaplain to James I., and possibly his sombre views of life were learned amidst the vanities of a Court. His hymn Sic Vita, "Like to the falling of a star," is to be found in many modern collections, but his Dirge, which far exceeds it in merit, is seldom met with.

A Dirge.

"What is the existence of man's life
But open war or slumbered strife:
Where sickness to his sense presents
The combat of the elements;
And never feels a perfect peace
Till Death's cold hand signs his release?

It is a Storm, where the hot blood
Outvies in rage the boiling flood;
And each loose passion of the mind
Is like a furious gust of wind,
Which beats his bark with many a wave
Till he cast anchor in the grave.

It is a Dream, whose seeming truth
Is moralised in age and youth:
When all the comforts he can share,
As wandering as his fancies are;
Till in a mist of dark decay
The dreamer vanish quite away.

It is a Dial, which points out
The sunset as it moves about,
And shadows out in lines of night
The subtle stages of Time's flight,
Till all-obscuring earth hath laid
His body in perpetual shade.

It is a weary Interlude,
Which doth short joys, long woes include:
The world the Stage, the Prologue tears,
The acts vain hopes and varied fears.
The scene shuts up with loss of breath,
And leaves no Epilogue but Death."

There is scarcely one of the mediæval hymns whose strains are so profoundly melancholy as these. Even the darkest of all, the terrible "Death Hymn" of the Cardinal Damiani, concludes with a trustful appeal to "the Shepherd of the sheep." What can be more doleful than the view of life taken by this Christian Bishop?—a "Storm," a "Dream," a "Dial," a "weary Interlude." We need to recall his "Midnight Meditation" (given in our last number), in order to satisfy ourselves that he had any faith at all in Him who hath abolished death. The Elizabethan hymnology is rich in hymns of this dismal character; dismal alike regarding life and death. Few, indeed, breathe the spirit expressed in the words of Paul, "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." Probably the explanation of this is to be found in the fact that many of the hymn-writers were much addicted to various "pleasing follies," and that death, which "burst the bubble of life," was to them at the best but an unwelcome necessity.

It is refreshing to turn from hymns which breathe so little of the spirit of the New Testament, to one on Hope by one of the most voluminous writers of sacred poetry of the Elizabethan age, Faithful Tate, father of Nahum Tate of the authorised metrical version of the Psalms. Far from the seductions of a Court and the ambitions of a camp, this good man quietly laboured in a country parish in Suffolk, employing his leisure in composing poems on religious subjects; and it is hardly too much to say that the one from which an extract is afterwards given is worth all the diffuse and smooth versification of his son. It is taken from a very rare and curious book called "Ter Triæ," of such repute once that a translation into German appeared in 1698, a singular honour for an English work in those days. Faithful Tate is now only known through the German edition of his book.

Hope.

"Author and Rock of all my hope!
Thou hast death's prison doors broke ope,
So fast'ning to faith's cable-rope
Hope's anchor strong,
What though I sail through foaming seas?
Billows are pillows, beds of ease:
Death's blast rocks me asleep in these;
Waiting ere long,

At Thy shrill sudden voice, to rise
And rub death's dust out of mine eyes
When death shall have disgorg'd its prize
Safe on the shore.
Then hold my rudder in Thine hand
Who put to sea at Thy command,
Till I may make some new-found land,
O help me o'er!

Oh, Conscience! Conscience! when I look
Into thy register, thy book,
What corner of my heart, what nook
Stands clear of sin?
And though my skin feels soft and sleek
Scarce can I touch my chin and cheek,
But I can feel death's jawbone prick
Even through my skin.

O Death! where is thy victory?
That I might live my Lord did die;
He tied thee not, but made thee fly,
Having drawn thy sting.
Thou hadst of teeth a double row,
Till Christ by His Cross dealt thee a blow
When fast'ning on Him. But thou art now
A toothless thing.*

Well mayst thou bark, but canst not bite,
Bending thy brow, showing thy spite:
Death, do thy worst: Hope sets me quite Beyond thy spleen.
What though my death seems written in
The very parchment of my skin
With the black ink of my foul sin:
Yet have I seen

* The following cotemporary lines, by Jeremy Taylor, are a fitting pendant to the above:—

"Death, the old Serpent's son,
Thou hadst a sting once like thy sire
That carried hell and ever-burning fire;
But those black days are done—
Thy foolish spite buried thy sting
In the profound and wide
Wound of our Saviour's side:
And now thou art become a tame and harmless thing,
A thing we dare not fear
Since we hear
That our triumphant God, to punish thee
For the affront thou didst Him on the tree,
Hath snatched the keys of hell out of thy hand,
And made thee stand
A porter at the gate of Life, thy mortal enemy.
O Thou who art that gate, command that he May, when we die
And hither fly,
Let us into the courts of heaven by Thee."

On both hands of a Friend once slain,
But since returned to life again,
A better story printed plain:—
My sight's but dim;
Yet in the print of the nails I see
Life in a Saviour's hands for me,
While as He hung upon the tree,
Hope hangs on Him.

And still shall hang on Him, until
My bones have learned to climb that hill
Where now He sits, and whence He will Yet come down hither,
That He may gather into one
Each dust of his and scattered bone:
Then shall He, as a living stone,
Translate me thither.

Therefore my dying tongue shall sing:
Yea even my flesh, that fading thing,
Shall rest in Hope for that day-spring
All the night of death.
And when I lay my weary head
And bones in the grave, as in a bed,
Let not the mourner say, he's dead,
But slumbereth."

FAITHFUL TATE.

The quaint beauties of this hymn do not require to be pointed out: its singularly terse and felicitous expression must commend itself to every critic, and its joyful assurance of faith to every Christian. The lines in italics are especially touching and forcible, and demonstrate the possibility of clothing the most vigorous and definite "orthodoxy" in poetic language. The simplicity of this hymn, with its calm tone of certain victory, must have come as if from the glowing atmosphere of some sunny height upon the troubled spirits who were walking in the deep gloom of the troublous period of the civil war. It falls still as a pleasant sound upon ears which are weary of the din of strife.

Passing over Ben Jonson, Drayton, Giles and Phineas Fletcher, Vaux, Surrey, Sidney, Mardley, Davies, Donne, Drummond, Fairfax, Browne, and Wither—that goodly group of men of letters by whom the hymnology of this era was enriched—a hymn by the dramatist George Gascoigne, merits quotation as a favourable specimen of the style of the early portion of the Elizabethan era. In Gascoigne's hymns the tendency to invest natural objects with spiritual meanings is quite obvious; but that exaggerated love of emblems and obscure analogies which distinguishes many of the hymn-writers of this period, and which seems to have been introduced by Donne, was a later growth. Gascoigne was one of those adventurers, half-literary, half-military, who abounded in the reign of Elizabeth. After completing his education at Cambridge he was disinherited by his father for his reckless extravagance, upon which he ran away to Holland, and obtained a commission from the Prince of Orange, in whose service he went through various vicissitudes, at one time being taken prisoner by the Spaniards, and at another receiving from his Dutch master a reward of three hundred guilders for his dashing bravery at the siege of Middleburg. He reappeared in England in the character of a literary man about Court, and wrote a masque called "The Princely Pleasures of Kenilworth," for Queen Elizabeth, whom he accompanied on one of her progresses, and also various translations from the Greek dramatic poets. We are left in his case, as in not a few others, to infer his piety from his hymns. Few of his poems are sacred, but of these, two graceful pieces, "Good Morrow" and "Good Night," only resigned their place in popular favour on the appearance of Bishop Ken's Morning and Evening Hymns.

GOOD MORROW.

"You that have spent the silent night
In sleep and quiet rest,
And joy to see the cheerful light
That riseth in the east;
Now cheer your soul, now cheer your heart,
Come help me now to sing,
Each willing wight come bear a part,
To praise the Heavenly King.

For as the deadly night did last
But for a little space,
And heavenly day now night is past
Doth show his pleasant face;
So must we hope to see God's face,
At last in Heaven on high,
When we have changed this mortal place
For immortality.

And of such hopes and heavenly joys
As then we hope to hold,
All earthly rights and worldly toys,
Are tokens to behold.
The day is like the day of doom,
The sun, the Son of man;
The skies, the heavens; the earth, the tomb,
Wherein we rest till then.

The rainbow bending in the sky,
Bedecked with sundry hues,
Is like the seat of God on high,
And seems to tell thee news:
That as thereby He promised
To drown the world no more,
So by the blood which Christ hath shed
He will our health restore.

The misty clouds that fall sometime,
And overcast the skies,
Are like to troubles of our time,
Which do but dim our eyes;
The little birds which sing so sweet,
Are like the angels' voice,
Which render God his praises meet,
And teach us to rejoice.

The carrion crow, that loathesome beast,
Which cries against the rain,
Both for her here and for the rest,
The Devil resembleth plain:
And as with guns we kill the crow,
For spoiling our relief,
The Devil so must we o'erthrow,
With gunshot of belief.

Unto God's joys for to attain
God send us all his grace,
And grant us after worldly pain
In heaven to have a place,
When we may still enjoy that light,
Which never shall decay;
Lord, for Thy mercy lend us might,
To see that joyous day."

GASCOIGNE.

Although it is difficult to see why the day resembles the "day of doom," the earth "the tomb," &c., yet the spirit which in "all earthly sights and worldly toys" saw tokens of the eternal and invisible is much to be reverenced. The hymn is interesting from its simple and devotional tone, and it is to be observed also that its construction contrasts remarkably with the complicated and fantastic metres which were afterwards fashionable.

The three popular hymn-writers of the latter part of the Elizabethan era—Herrick, author of "Noble Numbers," Crashaw, of "Steps to the Temple" and "Divine Poems," and Henry Vaughan, of "Silex Scintillans," were men of very diverse characters and aims. Of the Rev. R. Herrick, rector of Dean Prior, the scandalous author of the "Hesperides," the boon companion and dependant of the rich and dissolute royalists who rioted at the inn of the "Triple Tun" during the Protectorate, the less that is said the better. It is difficult to allow his claim to be a sacred poet at all. It is founded upon one hymn, "The Litany to the Holy Spirit," vigorous alike in poetry and thought, a hymn which is to be found in countless collections in England and America, and is probably the only Elizabethan hymn, with the exception of one by Mardley, ever used in public worship. It will at once be recognised by a single stanza—

> "In the hour of my distress,
> When temptations me oppress,
> And when I my sins confess,
> Sweet Spirit comfort me."

Not another of his sacred pieces has survived. Crashaw merits the name of a sacred poet, but his hymns for the most part have fallen into an undeserved oblivion. This is possibly owing to a suspicion of the orthodoxy of a man who deserted Protestantism for a more sensuous faith, but happily all men who speak the language of love to our Lord Jesus Christ use in the main the same tongue. Crashaw was at one time an ardent and powerful preacher in the Church of England, but on being expelled from his fellowship during the ascendancy of the Puritans, he joined the Church of Rome, and died in Italy, a canon of Loretto. Faulty as some of his hymns are, from an excess of passionate emotion unhappily expressed, he excelled all the hymn-writers of his day in imagination, ardent language, enthusiasm, and witchery of delicate metaphor, and he always succeeds in carrying away the reader by the charm of his lyrical movement. His "Meditation on the Day of Judgment," in imitation of the Dies Iræ, has a gloomy grandeur, which brings it near the original, while gems of imagery and thought sparkle through it here and there. The few lines which follow are taken almost at random from the hymn.

> "O those eyes! whose angry light
> Must be the day of that dread night."

Again, of the trump, which—

> "Shall urge the murm'ring graves to bring > Pale mankind forth to meet his King."

Of the terror upon all things—

> "When stars themselves shall stagger, and
> The most firm foot no more can stand."

Of the final doom—

> "Oh! when thy last frown shall proclaim,
> The flocks of goats to folds of flame."

A profound tenderness mingles with the sublimity; the plea to the Judge of men contains some beautiful lines, beginning with the stanza—

> "Thy sheep was strayed, and Thou wouldst be > E'en lost thyself in seeking me;
> If sin can sigh, love can forgive,
> O say the word, my soul shall live."

Among the many beauties of Crashaw it is difficult to make any selection. The hymn given below is inferior to some others in poetic expression, and is less a specimen of his ordinary style than of that strange loving magnification of redemption in which he occasionally indulged.

CHARITAS NIMIA; OR, THE DEAR BARGAIN.

"Lord, what is man? Why should he cost Thee
So dear? What had his ruin lost Thee?
Lord, what is man that Thou hadst over bought
So much a thing of nought?

Let him go weep
O'er his own wounds;
Seraphims will not sleep,
Nor spheres let fall their faithful rounds;
Still would the youthful spirits sing,
And still Thy spacious palace ring,
Still would those beauteous ministers of light
Burn all as bright,
And bow their flaming heads before Thee;
Still thrones and dominations would adore Thee;
Still would those ever-wakeful sons of fire
Keep warm Thy praise
Both nights and days,
And teach Thy loved name to their noble lyre.
Why should a piece of peevish clay plead shares
In the eternity of Thy old cares?
Why shouldst Thou bend Thine awful breast to see
What mine own madnesses have done with me?

Will the world's illustrious eyes
Weep for every worm that dies?
Will the gallant sun
E'er the less glorious run?
Will he hang down his golden head,
Or sooner seek his western bed,
Because some foolish fly
Grows wanton and will die!

If I am lost in misery,
What was it to Thy heaven and Thee?
What was it to Thy precious blood
If my foul heart call'd for a flood?

What if my faithless soul and I
Would needs fall in
With guilt and sin,
What did the Lamb that He should die?
What did the Lamb that He should need
When the wolf sins Himself to bleed?

If my base lust
Bargained with death and well-beseeming dust,
Why should the white
Lamb's bosom write
The purple name
Of my sin's shame?
Why should His unstained breast make good
My blushes with His own heart blood?

Oh, my Saviour! make me see
How dearly thou hast paid for me;
That lost again my life may prove
As then in death, so now in love."

RICHARD CRASHAW.

The last of this triad is Henry Vaughan, the quiet Welsh doctor, whose professional avocations were so little onerous that he found leisure to "communicate his poor talent to the Church, under the protection and conduct of her glorious Head," by giving forth a faithful record of his heart in a volume of sacred poems called "Silex Scintillans" (Sparks from a Flintstone). "Holy George Herbert," he says, was his model; and many of his faults are to be traced to this source. In the preface to his volume, after eulogising Herbert, he makes the following true remark: "He that desires to excel in this kind of Hagiography, or holy writing, must strive by all means for perfection and true holiness that a door may be opened for him in heaven, and then he will be able to write, with Hierotheus and holy George Herbert, a true hymn." Possibly the absence of excellence in the Elizabethan hymns may partly be accounted for by the absence of this initial qualification in many of the hymn-writers. Vaughan's hymns were little esteemed by the godless generation for which he wrote, and their beauties are now appreciated only by a select few. His faults as a hymn-writer are mainly those of the style of the age in which he lived and of the master he imitated. His hymns are full of quaint and fantastic terms, and ingenious strainings after obscure metaphor and allusion; their originality of thought is often condensed into obscurity, and their felicity of expression defaced by conceits. The lines are overcrowded with ideas, and often read inharmoniously; and he continually makes the sense of one line run into the line following, exaggerating what is doubtless a beauty in versification. But his spirit overflowed with religious ardour; his hymns are the genuine expression of the heart of a man who walked humbly with his God; and the thought, though clothed in quaint and antiquated garb, is vigorous and poetic enough to redeem his volume from oblivion. The only hymn of Vaughan's which compilers have thought worthy of selection is among the least meritorious of the whole number—"Rules and Lessons." "When first thine eyes unveil, give thy soul leave."*

* As the space is too limited to admit of quotation, the first lines of some of Vaughan's best hymns are appended.

THE DAWNING.

"Oh! what time wilt Thou come? When shall the cry
'The Bridegroom's coming!' fill the sky?
Shall it in the evening run
When our words and works are done?
Or will Thy all surprising light
Break at midnight,
When either sleep or some dark pleasure
Possesseth mad man without measure?
Or shall these early fragrant hours
Unlock Thy bowers,
And with their blush of light descry
Thy locks crowned with eternity?" &c., &c.

The Passion—"Oh my chief good." The Match—"Accept, dread Lord, the poor oblation." Sundays—"Bright shadows of true rest" Praise—"King of comforts, King of life." Dressing—"Oh, Thou that lov st a pure and whitened soul." Love and Discipline—"Since in a land not barren still. Departed Friends—"They are all gone into a world of light."

The hymns quoted in this and the preceding paper sufficiently illustrate the style of the Elizabethan hymnology. Their authors generally "were such as laboured after conceits or novel turns of thought, usually false, and resting upon some equivocation of language or exceedingly remote analogy." In these words Dr. Johnson has admirably described the corrupt taste which pervaded the poetry and infected the prose and even the pulpit literature of the period. In analysing many of the hymns we find that the most brilliant illustrations are only feats of verbal sleight-of-hand: the resemblance between the objects vanishes as soon as the thoughts are translated into plain terms. The literary taste of Elizabeth's reign, and the diffused pedantry of the time of James I., were more favourable to the development of trick and whim in hymn-writers than to the growth of a truly devotional hymnology. The succeeding period, which closed the Elizabethan era in letters, was one in which the flowers of poetry drooped ere fully blown. Its sterner teachings produced a few hymns of more vigorous thought and expression, of which the one on "Hope," by Faithful Tate, is a specimen; but on the whole the temper of the nation was too serious to effloresce in poetry, although it moulded into an awful greatness the poetic genius and vision of one man. The atmosphere was too sternly ascetic, too fiercely controversial, too keenly exclusive, for such airy creatures as "singing angels" to breathe and fly in. The riotous literary luxuriance of Elizabeth's reign, the pedantic affectation of the reign of James, and the stormy and gloomy era which succeeded, were all unfavourable to the production of "true hymns." There is indeed little enough in the Elizabethan hymnology to warrant its restoration. It is mainly interesting as indicative of the prevailing form of religious thought during eighty years; thought occasionally expressed in vigorous language, but lacking poetic beauty and the fervour of an enthusiastic devotion. It might be that though the old sensuous and emotional creed had lost its hold on men; the new faith, in all its glorious vitality of love and hope, was not, as in Germany, fully received: "the abundance of the heart was lacking," and so the mouth spake not. It was not till a later day that the Church in England anointed herself with the oil of gladness, and put on her robes of festival, on awaking into the realisation of the "glorious hope" which was hers through the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ.

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

XI.—GOOD WORKS.

Those bodies of ours which the Psalmist pronounces, and science the more they are studied the more clearly proves, to be fearfully and wonderfully made, God has furnished with many different organs. Among them all, there is none useless, or to be dispensed with. Each has its own peculiar and also important office—on the due performance of which our health depends in all cases, and in some our life. Let any of them cease to discharge, or but imperfectly discharge, its functions, and in the course of time, not it only, but the whole body suffers. For, though functional are less alarming than organic affections, the irregular action of any organ is apt to run into disease; and disease, after a longer or shorter period of suffering, to terminate in general disorder; and that at length in death. Such is the perfect harmony between the different parts of our frame that they all sympathise with, and, for pleasure, health, and even life itself, are mutually dependent on each other. A somewhat similar dependence characterises all the true members of Christ's body—his church, by whatever name they go, to whatever class or order they belong. An important fact that!—nor could anything better prove the high importance which St. Paul attaches to it, than the striking manner in which he thus insists on, and expands it: "By one Spirit," he says, "are we all baptised into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. . . . If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it, therefore, not of the body? And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it, therefore, not of the body? If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? if the whole were hearing, where were the smelling? . . . If they were all one member, where were the body? But now are they many members, yet but one body. And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you . . . Whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it. Ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular."

This beautifully drawn analogy between the members of Christ's body and those of our material frame teaches many lessons; and among these, not the least important is this, that we become members of his body not for ornament merely, nor even for our salvation and enjoyment only, but also for work. Activity is the universal characteristic of all life, human and Divine. God himself offers no exception to this rule: "My Father worketh hitherto," says Jesus, "and I work:" nor on the other hand, does it find an exception even in those animals or plants that stand lowest in the scale of Creation. But take an example from our own bodies. In what respect are they encumbered with useless or idle members? The hands are formed to work, the feet to walk, the eyes to look, the ears to listen, the tongue to taste, the teeth to grind and the digestive organs to extract nourishment from our food, the lungs to breathe, the brain to feel and think, and the heart—the first to live and last to die, and greatest worker of all—to beat by night and day without a pause; supplying the waste of every organ, and sending its tide of blood to the extremities of the body. And, as in camp followers, or armour, or baggage, what does not promote impairs the efficiency of an army; as in a household those who do not help hinder work, if the body through accident or monstrous birth has a limb that is of no service, it is considered an incumbrance rather than an advantage. Regarded as a deformity, not an ornament, it is removed; when the operation can be safely performed, it is condemned to the surgeon's knife. So is it with Christ's body—that Church of the living God which He has purchased with his blood. By whatever hands they were baptised, to whatever Communion they professedly belong, let none fancy that they belong to Christ, unless they are found working in his service. For them to talk of being saved by faith is to dishonour the Gospel, and to deceive themselves. Faith without works, as James plainly tells us, is dead; and like all dead things, is an offence.

Yet, if there is need to warn some against trusting to their own works for salvation, or fixing their hopes on any but the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world, there is probably as much need to warn others against a more pleasant but equally fatal error—this, namely, that they can be true without being working Christians. There is a sloth and self-indulgence which, divorcing what God hath joined together—faith and works, peace and penitence, the spirit and the enjoyment of heaven—trusts to be saved without an effort; to receive the reward without undergoing the labour, the crown without bearing the cross. If words have any meaning, how plainly opposed to this delusion these weighty exhortations?—labour for the bread that never perisheth; give all diligence to make your calling and election sure; work out your salvation with fear and trembling; pray without ceasing; watch unto prayer; be instant in season and out of season; work while it is called to-day, for the night cometh when no man can work; the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force; if any man will be my disciple let him take up his cross, deny himself daily, and follow me; if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee, for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell; and if thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee, for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. Liars, thieves, drunkards, adulterers, murderers, the vilest of impenitent sinners, are not more certain to be lost than those decent persons who do nothing for Christ, flattering themselves that a worthless and a workless faith shall save them. Their peace is false; and one could fancy that the prophet had them, and the day that shall judge us all not by our professions but performances, in his eye, when he says:—"Because they have seduced my people, saying, Peace; and there was no peace; and one built up a wall, and, lo, others daubed it with untempered mortar: say unto them which daub it with untempered mortar, that it shall fall. . . . Thus saith the Lord God: I will even rend it with a stormy wind in my fury; and there shall be an overflowing shower in mine anger, and great hailstones in my fury to consume it. . . . Thus will I accomplish my wrath upon the wall, and upon them that have daubed it with untempered mortar, and will say unto you, The wall is no more, neither they that daubed it." Alas! deeming it an easy thing to gain heaven, they shall be buried in the ruin of hopes it was folly ever to entertain, and shall then be too late to amend. The night has come when no man can work. From a fate so sad, yet so certain, if, living for enjoyment rather than employment, we neglect the arduous duties of this great salvation, may the good Lord deliver us!

It is impossible to set too high a value on the blood of Christ. It cleanseth from all sin, and it only cleanseth from any. Washed in it the greatest sinner shall be saved; without it, the least of sinners must be lost. To a poor guilty man, suffering the stings of conscience and standing in terror of death and the judgment, it is better than gold, yea, than much fine gold; the pearl of great price, which he would sell all, and, were he possessed of a thousand worlds, would part with them all to buy. It is equally impossible, on the other hand, to undervalue the worth of our own works. Till we are reconciled to God, and, born again through his Spirit, have become new creatures in Jesus Christ, we are his enemies. Our works do not spring from love to Him, and therefore cannot have any value in his eyes. And how imperfect are even the best works of the best saints! There is foulness enough in the purest heart, and, in respect of their motives, manner, and object, sin enough in our best actions,—those whereby we do most good and earn most commendation, to condemn us. To speak of us not in our worst but best state, not of the sins we commit, but of the best services we render, our wine has its water and our silver has its dross. And so, abandoning every hope of acceptance with a holy God through our own merits, let us cling to the cross of Christ, as a drowning man to the plank that, embraced in his arms, floats him to the shore; the language of our faith an echo of his who breathed out his life with these words on his lips, None but Christ, none but Christ!

Still, I question whether good works are held in sufficient value by many whom notwithstanding we must regard as sincere Christians—a state of mind theirs that cannot be approved, and yet can without much difficulty be accounted for. Whoever reflects on the spherical form of the earth will perceive that a traveller going east may continue his journey in that direction till, passing round half the globe, he is on the west of us. He has, in fact, by advancing very far on one and the same line, exactly reversed his position. And just as a man, if he goes very far east, gets into the west, so there is always a danger lest, in our anxiety to avoid one error, we go so far in the opposite direction as to fall into another. Almost all religious, to say nothing of other controversies, illustrate this fact. The longer they rage, the fiercer grow the passions which they kindle, and the more extreme the positions which the combatants, carried away by their feelings, are apt to assume.

For example, the Reformation in Scotland, which, in contradistinction to that of England, was opposed by the whole power of the crown and owed little to the nobles, was, under God and the few distinguished leaders He raised for the occasion, a popular movement. The people had a hard fight of it, and the people fought it well. They made, to use one of their own favourite expressions, "root and branch" work of the demolition of Popery. Still, this Reformation presented to some degree an example of the tendency that men show to pass from one extreme to another, especially when borne along on the crest of a popular wave. This cannot fairly be denied, I think; and wily be denied by none but those who admire our reformers well, but not wisely; who seem to claim for them an infallibility which they denied to the Pope, nor ever thought of claiming for themselves. However justifiable and commendable such movements may be, they commonly present, with its resistless power, more or less of the violence of a river which, swollen high with rains, not only clears its channel of the impediments that obstruct its progress, but also in various places undermines its own banks, and hurls away in its impetuous, red, roaring flood the soil that fertilises, and the trees that adorn them.

I will yield to no man in a high and just admiration of the principles, the piety, the energy, the sagacity, and the heroic courage of the Scottish Reformers. Events have justified almost everything for which they were once condemned. Yet I cannot but think that in their devout abhorrence of a sensuous and formal religion, they somewhat overlooked the aid a spiritual worship may receive from forms, if these are in harmony with a devout mind and the apostolic rule, "Let all things be done decently and in order." We sympathise with the zeal with which they stript the Church of meretricious ornaments; but they might have substituted for the gorgeous vestments and heathenish trappings of Popery what would have seemed in some respects a less scanty and mean attire. There is no sin in beauty, nor holiness in ugliness. God adorns all his works, painting even the flowers of the field, and bathing their leaves in delicious fragrance. And why then need it have been thought almost a sin to introduce music into his service that gratified the ear, or meet for his worship but within the cold bare walls of a mean and naked edifice? Many things, indeed, have been unjustly laid to the charge of our fathers. Knox and his coadjutors were not the rude, uncultivated men their enemies represented them, and some, giving too ready credence to Popish lies, believed them to have been. It is not to cast blame on them, but to illustrate our proneness to pass to extremes, that I have touched a small fault—one it is easy to extenuate. For what surgeon so skilful as to remove a monstrous excrescence without his knife taking some flesh along with it? or what vast tree, the growth of centuries, was ever uprooted but it injured the green sward, and tore up some good soil in the meshes of its gigantic roots?

Our tendency to run into extremes finds no less striking and more sad illustrations in the doctrinal positions which good men have allowed themselves to be driven into by the violence of controversy and the natural recoil from error. In their zeal to put down one error they have often fallen into another—to use Archbishop Whately's favourite adage, going too far east, they have got into the west. Of this we have a remarkable example in the positions in which Wesley and Toplady were found at the end of their controversy. Eminently good men, whose names are still fragrant and whose praise is in all the churches, at the commencement of their controversy the first appeared as the champion of a moderate Arminianism, the second of a moderate Calvinism. But ere that unhappy war had spent its vehemence, Wesley in his recoil from Toplady's Calvinism, and the other in his recoil from Wesley's Arminianism, had each taken up positions, and ventured on statements, which in their calmer moments neither of them would have approved or defended.

If traced to its source, the secondary place given to good works by many, and even by some good and sincere Christians in their creed, if not in their conduct, will also be found, I think, to arise from our proneness to pass from one extreme to another. The Church of Rome taught her people to recommend themselves to the favour of God by good works, as she calls them—fastings and watchings, gifts of charity to the poor and of piety to the church, lives of voluntary poverty, and various acts of painful penance. Her Sustentation Fund is the doctrine of purgatory: and, notwithstanding the ostentatious parade she makes of cross and crucifix, her principle, to all practical intents and purposes, is salvation by works. This appears in every country where, removed from the restraining influences of Protestantism, her character, like a plant growing in its native soil, is fully developed. There only, Popery is seen aright; as is the lion in the desert he shakes with his cruel roar, or the tiger in the Indian jungles through which, crashing like a bolt, she makes her fatal spring; not in those menageries where, confined within iron bars and subdued by hunger, these savage beasts, but occasionally growling, quietly pace their narrow bounds, and cower beneath the keeper's eye.

For example, in a cathedral, far south in Italy, I saw a man working out his "salvation with fear and trembling." It was done under the eye of his priests; but in a manner hardly less offensive, I suppose, to Him who is to be worshipped in spirit and in truth than the pagan rites of those temples whose graceful ruins stood near by, on the shores of the blue Mediterranean and under the shadow of the snow-crowned Apennines. It was morning mass; and with only its loftiest windows touched by the beams of the rising sun, the cathedral of Salerno was filled with a solemn gloom—a dim, religious light. With an attention to their religious duties that might put many Protestants to the blush, domestic servants leaving the family a-bed, and humble labourers on their way to field or workshop, were there—praying, with their eyes turned on a crucifix, or more probably on their knees either before an image of the Virgin, or the shrine that held the mouldering relics of their patron saint. Arrayed in gorgeous robes, muttering prayers, like incantations, in an unknown tongue, and attended by boys with smoking censers and tinkling bells, some priests were already officiating at the altars; while others, carrying the Host—the true body of our Lord, as they say, were passing with grave and solemn pomp across the marble floor to begin their services for the living or the offices of the dead. But from all this mummery and imposing array, my attention was turned on an object that filled me with mingled feelings of indignation, pity, and astonishment. An old man, bent under the weight of years, entered. Having dipped his finger in the holy water by the door, and crossed himself with trembling hand in the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, he advanced with slow and tottering step to the centre of the church. There, under the eye of passing and approving, or careless and indifferent priests, he cast himself on the floor. Prostrate on his hands and knees, he bowed till his lips kissed, and his forehead touched the pavement. A posture his of deepest reverence; and yet but the prelude of an act painful to see and more painful to reflect on, as a degrading and soul-destroying superstition. In this prostrate posture he protruded his tongue; and, with his long grey locks sweeping the dirty floor, crawled forward on hands and knees; and, as he crawled, with bleeding tongue he licked the marble pavement, till he had drawn among its dust a large, long figure of the cross. Thus, poor, pitiable, ignorant devotee, he was taught to earn the pardon of his sins! If he had ever heard, how did he misunderstand these grand words, "God forbid that I should glory save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world!" But thus, by prayers and penances, by fasts and vigils, and some things, otherwise commendable, which Popery calls good works, she teaches, and has always taught, that men may earn the mercy of God and purchase a right to heaven.

By putting them in the place of Christ, his righteousness, and saving work, Popery brought good works into bad odour—into such disrepute, indeed, that even Martin Luther, because St. James highly commended them, rejected his epistle from the canon of inspired Scripture. In their recoil from her errors, men appeared at the period of the Reformation who burst asunder the bounds of all morality. Denouncing the doctrine of good works as a delusion of Satan and an encroachment on the freedom wherewith Christ makes his people free, they openly indulged in the grossest vices; saying, that with their "life hid with Christ in God," these polluted them no more than the gutter does the kernel inside the nut which falls into it. Nor has Rome only taught that salvation is more of works than of faith. Last century saw a sad eclipse of sound doctrine in almost all Protestant Churches. Their pulpits were occupied by men who, ignorant of the truth, or ashamed to own their Lord and to defend his cause, discoursed a cold morality; fed the people with empty husks; and putting good works, as they called them, in the place of the cross, held up heathen virtues rather than Christ and Christian graces to admiration. And under that law of action and reaction which makes the human mind, as well as a pendulum, swing from one extreme to the opposite, the result was what might have been expected. From being over-valued, good works came to be under-valued; theirs the fate of the brazen serpent, which, from being an object of idolatry, was treated with a measure of contempt—ground to powder, and called Nehustan, or a piece of brass. I cannot otherwise explain the carelessness which many display about Christian works, and the hopes they entertain of getting to heaven without having ever given such proofs of conversion as they afford. Nor can I otherwise account for the positive aversion which some good people show, not certainly to doing, but to hearing of good works. So morbid is this feeling that they would suspect the orthodoxy of the preacher who assigned them a prominent place in his sermons. St. Paul says, "Be ye followers of me;" but would they venture, lest they should puff up any, or encourage them to trust in their own merits, to follow him in the style in which he closes his epistle to the Romans? Bold and generous man, he commends Phebe by name and others also for their works; in anticipation of Christ's own "Well done," he applauds their services, and, recording their names in the imperishable pages of the Bible, crowns them with immortal honour.

It is told, for example, of an eminent saint, how, on one who sat by his dying bed delicately alluding to important services which he had rendered to the cause of religion, he started—started as if he had heard a serpent hiss; and turning round with an expression of pain and horror on his face, besought his friend, as he loved him, to make no mention of his poor unworthy works. And I have seen it recorded to the praise of another, as indicating the healthiest and holiest state a man could live or die in, that to those who spoke of his good works he instantly replied, "I take my good and bad works, and casting them into one heap, fly from both to Christ!" Now, though seeing in our best works much to make us blush, and nothing whatever, since it is by grace we are what we are, to make us vain, I venture to say that good works, by which I mean, works done for the glory of the Father, from love to the Son, and by the aid of the Holy Spirit, deserve a more respectful treatment. It is the exaggeration of a right feeling, and a false humility which casts them into the same heap with our sins. Our trust for pardon and acceptance should rest entirely in the blood of Christ; yet the works which have pleased our heavenly Father and profited our fellow-creatures, are to be recalled with thankfulness on a dying bed. Fruits of the Spirit, which glorify not us, but Him through whose grace they have been wrought, they are clear and comfortable evidence of our being the children of God.

It was not thus, as some have done, that Paul spoke of good works. It may be news to many, yet it is true that he applies the same lofty terms to them which he uses to proclaim and enforce salvation by the blood of Christ. To Timothy he says, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners;" and to Titus he says, employing not an equivalent but the identical expression, "This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works." On death-beds, on the deck, wherever loved ones tear themselves from each other's arms, at all partings, the last are not the least important words; and it is with exhortations to good works that Paul takes farewell of the Church of Philippi. "Finally, brethren," he says, "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report: if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." Elsewhere, placing good works on a yet loftier platform, in language the strongest possible according them yet higher honours, he says, "God is not unrighteous to forget our work and labour of love showed toward his name:" and, after that, it were surely no presumption to say that it cannot be wrong for us modestly to remember what God will not forget: and further still, that it cannot be right for us to be careless of such works as this great preacher of faith says are ordained of God, and bids us be careful to maintain.

Who ponders the Apostle's words aright, and forms a proper estimate of their importance, will be less surprised than some, no doubt, are at the manner in which Nehemiah mentions his good works in his prayers. Addressing God, he speaks of them in a way which many good men never ventured on. When counselled to fly, he spurned the coward advice: and asking, Shall such a man as I flee? against the enemies of his God, his faith, his country, and his countrymen—> stood like an iron pillar strong

> And steadfast as a wall of brass.

But some who admire the boldness with which, amid a crowd of enemies, he faces man, may think his bearing before God over bold; and that he trode the borders of presumption—when, relating his pious and patriotic deeds, he addresses Jehovah, saying, "Wipe not out my good deeds that I have done for the house of my God, and for the offices thereof!" Did such a thought occur to them when engaged in prayer, many would strangle it in their hearts—regarding it as a suggestion of the devil; a temptation to be resisted, if not a sin to be mourned; as only suited to the lips of one who distributed his alms to the sound of a trumpet, and prayed in corners of the street that he might be praised of men, and said, expressing the sentiments of a heart inflated with pride, I thank thee, O God, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican! Yet when Nehemiah prayed, "Remember me,

O God, concerning this," he only asked him to remember what Paul assures us God is not so unrighteous as to forget. He was no proud, self-righteous Pharisee. A most devout, humble, and holy man, he confessed his own and his people's sins—praying, fasting, weeping, and, while he asks his good works to be remembered, throwing himself at God's feet to cry, Spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy! What a fine example of a true Christian—the humble believer yet the diligent worker!

The truth is, that to set little store on good works is an immoral and most pestilent heresy. The works by which we recommend religion and adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, the works which spring from love to Christ and aim at the glory of God, the works by which a good man blesses society and leaves the world better than he found it, are not the "filthy rags" of Holy Scripture. No filthy rags, but the gracious and graceful ornaments of a blood-bought Church; these, on the contrary, are the "gold of Ophir," "the raiment of needle-work" in which His bride, apparelled as a queen, stands at her Lord's right-hand—a lovely form, in a blaze of beauty and of jewels.

A VISIT TO THE CHRISTIANS OF ELBA.

SECOND PAPER.

THE Bible, which had sustained Francesco Madiai through his trial of cruel mockings and imprisonment, was, in 1855, offered by him in the place of his exile to the captain of a small trading vessel from the island of Elba. The word was accompanied with power. Grace is always a germinating principle, and so the captain on his return home gathered two or three of his dearest connections around the lamp of life. They too received the gospel in the power of the same Spirit. That they might not be deprived of the Bbile, which had now become their hand-book for eternity, they secreted it, in the intervals of their reading, in a hole in a garden wall. As their obedience to the Truth finally imparted boldness to their conduct, they no longer consulted the Word apart and by stealth, but, as their numbers increased, they met in a large upper room, accessible to all the neighbourhood. The mass, and all the other public and private observances of the Romish Church, were at once and for ever abandoned. This of itself, however, involved no pains and penalties. Their conduct might be classed with that of those who, while they avoided the services of Rome under the plea of Indifferentism or Infidelity, submitted nevertheless to the hierarchy and called themselves Catholics. Moreover, this was a moment of general enlargement. Italy had just burst through the thraldom of ages, and was running wild upon the theory of freedom of thought and action. This licence, however, would not benefit the Fratelli (Brethren). For as their lives were regulated by God's word, their conduct became an open protest against surrounding wickedness. And as nothing is more offensive to the natural man, dislike and hatred to the Brethren, as a natural consequence, grew into active persecution.

"Certain lewd fellows of the baser sort," headed by their priest, proceeded to burn the hated heretics in their dwelling. That they were defeated in their diabolical purpose was to be attributed, not to any intervention of public authority, but to the substantial nature of the dwelling, and the inconstancy of the mob. The Syndic alleged in justification, that he had not force sufficient to ensure the maintenance of public order, and the Brethren were consequently left to the tender mercies of a lawless rabble. Their fury finally exhausted itself, but they did not fail to adopt the lesser, and generally the more successful, arts of persecution. Their households were divided: their intercourse was shunned by friends and acquaintances; and society at large damaged their temporal interests by slander and misrepresentation. "None of these things moved them." They held fast their integrity, as seeing Him, who is invisible, and knowing that these afflictions were appointed for them.

In this, the crisis of their fate, a trial awaited them severer far than lighted faggots around their dwelling, or their "name cast out as evil." Their numbers had now grown into a little community, and as the Constitution of Carlo Alberto recognised religious liberty, they proceeded to collect funds amongst themselves for a place of worship. The Waldensian Church, attracted by their history, on repeated occasions sent them for a few weeks persons accredited to strengthen them concerning their faith; and finally, as their church progressed to completion, confided them to the ministry of a Frenchman of good report and promise. Alas! he left the few sheep in the wilderness, and returned like Demas to the world. This intelligence, more alarming because more dangerous than hot persecution, hurried Dr. Revel and his wife to the spot: two individuals singularly suited in the providence of God to such an emergency. Their fears, the moment they set their foot on shore, were given to the winds. For, so far from finding the Brothers moved by these things to "turn from the holy commandment delivered to them," they were comforted over them in all their distresses by their strong faith. The authorised report of their visit affirms, that "a contrary effect has issued, to what with so much reason was apprehended. The faith of the Brethren has come out of the trial more purified, more firm—more really faith in God—in his Word—in his Gospel, so that precisely from that which seemed destined to annihilate it, the Church of Rio Marina has been more solidly built up." The whole of the summer vacation (Dr. Revel is the president of the Waldensian College in Florence) of last year was devoted, not only to heal the breach which had occurred, but to make such arrangements as their actual and growing necessities required. The things which were wanting were set in order, and a minister was appointed whose antecedents warrant the expectation that he will not only "give no offence in anything, that the ministry be not blamed, but in all things approve himself as the minister of God." Six months after this arrangement we land amongst them to rejoice in their growing order, and to find a religious body such, both in respect of life and doctrine, as would have gladdened the heart of St. Paul, and may be ranked with any of the happiest eras of the Christian Church. We joined in worship with them in a building which, for its simplicity and general suitableness, I prefer to those gorgeous palace-shrines where man indulges in a sensuous service before Him who will be worshipped only in spirit and truth.

The temple which these few poor fishermen raised out of their scanty store is in the simple Gothic style. The interior consists of one plain nave. A vaulted roof stretches through the whole length of the building, whose walls are decorated, not with memorial fantasies, but with words of everlasting life. These words (Rev. ii. 10 ; John iv. 34 ; Eph. ii. 8 ; and 1 John ii. 12) indicate men who have actually renounced error and embraced faith under the test of persecution, and are admirably suited to their case.

On either side of the apse are the tables of the law, whose summary, as given by our Saviour in Matt. xxii. 37—40, is recorded at the opposite end of the church. Within the apse stands the pulpit, with the communion-table before it. The men and women sit apart. There are sittings for 150 persons in a building capable of holding double that number. On the outside, over the entrance, the character of the worship is at once indicated by the words, "Tempio Evangelico," while over the wheel-window above is blazoned forth to every passer-by that glorious announcement of Christ Jesus, "God so loved the world, that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." (John iii. 16.) The registered number of the Fratelli at present stands at one hundred, of whom sixty-four are recognised and regular communicants. The congregation, however, always consists, besides the Brethren, of men who approve the worship, but lack the courage of, on the one hand, renouncing the Romish Church, and on the other accepting the prescription required for the brotherhood. However, at this point of their history we expect to see not only a steady development in their Christian profession, but in their actual numbers. It was when the first Christian Church had rest from persecution, and the first Christian Council had decreed against false brethren, that it was edified and multiplied. Already we have the beginning of such a realisation. Two-thirds of the population are in passive sympathy with them, and are only withheld from actual communion through unworthy fear or interest. The Bible which Cignoni brought to Rio has not only removed Romish error from the hearts of the Brethren, and from their dwellings images and old wives' fables, but is found in the houses and consulted as the oracle of truth by numbers of those who still conform to the worship of Rome. The result is certain. The Bible and Rome cannot stand together.

Their "patient continuance in well-doing" has so lived down opposition, that even the Syndic himself, upon whom we waited, ostensibly to pay our respects, but chiefly to refer incidentally to the Brethren, bore them this testimony: that they were the best-conducted, the most upright, and the most industrious of the whole population. He could not allege an indiscretion or contemplate in any way a contravention of his authority by any member of their body. How noble a testimony is this in such a place and by such a man —a Syndic and a Romanist. "But the Fratelli," we remarked, "have already suffered from violence. (I thought it opportune to refer to this, for I had seen on our entering the notable priest escape from his boudoir.) Even within these few days their worship has been disturbed by some one throwing stones through the church-window. May not a sudden outburst of popular passion produce a second Barletta?" "Oh! as to the stone," he replied, "that was the unmeaning act of some thoughtless boy. No one here, I am sure, wishes to interfere with them in any way. As to Barletta, no one can pronounce more indignantly against that than I do. I have sufficient means to make my authority respected, and I pledge myself that it shall be exercised, if need be, not only to protect these men from violence, but their worship from disturbance." We engaged that so welcome an assurance should be communicated to the Brethren, and only regretted that we could not convey a like assurance from the Government to every Protestant in the peninsula at a moment when the "Movimento" in a place* whose archbishop had pledged himself to Protestant extirpation, had delivered itself of such sentiments as necessitated its Protestant citizens to claim the protection of the Prefect.

After the Brothers had provided a suitable church for their worship, their next care was to secure a God's acre for their dead—their resting-place in hope until the morning of the resurrection. A cemetery was accordingly consecrated on a knoll in one of the most charming spots in the neighbourhood. Below hastens the stream of Rio—so like life, now joyous and clear, now impatient and troubled—to lose its fretting strife in the tideless sea, the image, unstirred by nature's passion, of deep, boundless, and abiding peace. Above rise the dark and savage crags of Mont Serrat, peering over the sides of hills, which shoulder up the high and lonely cone of the Tower of Jove, looking far away and above the dreams and passions and follies of men, full into the repose of heaven.

The cemetery is well walled-in and planted with cypresses, and entered by a handsome iron-gate. At the further end are four mortuary chapels over vaults belonging to the elders of the brotherhood. Already only one of them is unoccupied. This I visited, and, to my astonishment, found it as carefully finished, as though for the abode of the living. The whole appearance of the place surprised me, considering the position of the Brethren, and how often God's acre testifies to the neglect and forgetfulness of survivors. Hitherto, only two have been interred in the open ground. The church itself is scarcely in more than an embryo state. The only inscription in the place is to the memory of the Cignonis' mother, a second Anna, who for fourscore years waited for "the Consolation of Israel." I cannot do better than give a translation of this first Protestant memorial in Elba, not because its classic Italian is worthy of the dead who sleep in Santa Croce's aisle, but because it is here the first Gospel witness for those who sleep in Jesus since the days of the Fathers :—

"Giacoma Cignoni. Born 25th February, 1787, entered into the peace of the Lord, 2nd December, 1865. After having lived seventy-eight years in the Romish Church, she, on the brink of the grave, exulting knew and adored the Christ of the Gospel, who brought to her heart grace, pardon, peace, and eternal joy. Blessing God for the conversion granted, and mourning their beloved mother, her family, grieving, has here placed this monument.

"Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life : he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live.—John xi. 25."

In both these constructions the Brethren had regard to their first wants. These satisfied, their next object was to provide a school for their children and a house for their pastor. These must have been indefinitely deferred, and cannot now be completed but for assistance from without. The better to economise resources and to suit their present modest beginnings, it was decided that the two objects should be met under one roof. Accordingly, adjoining the church a building is in progress, the upper part of which will form the pastor's home, and the lower, divided into two spacious and well-ventilated compartments, will accommodate one hundred scholars, fifty of each sex. Till this twofold purpose be accomplished the pastor and his wife will remain in their own hired apartments, and the school be carried on under very limited appliances in an underground chamber. It is engaged that the school department be finished first, as the more pressing necessity of the two, and that its direction be immediately entrusted to a master and mistress well qualified for general and useful education, so that the Fratelli may be relieved from their present painful position of seeing Protestant children sent to the Romish school, if more is required from them than their own merest elementary education. If present arrangements be carried out, two consequences are inevitable. The tone and character of the Protestant population will be raised, and the number of scholars will be largely augmented, not only from among themselves, but more from the Romish element of the place. That is to say, the schools will form a fulcrum to shake a superstition and confirm a faith.

Lastly, to link themselves to "the whole state of Christ's church here upon earth," they have more than once, unasked, opened their sympathies to their brethren abroad in their trial of affliction. Recently, it was no sooner known that the angel of death was shaking pestilence from his wings over the doomed city of Naples, than, prompt to the occasion, they instantly ministered according to, and even beyond, their power, to the wants of those there who, like themselves, had renounced the errors of the Church of Rome for the gospel of the grace of God.

Having thus far spoken generally of the circumstances of the Christian society of Rio Marina, I shall now give some brief account of my visit to their church service and their schools.

There are three full services in the church during the week. Their form of worship nearly resembles that of the Scottish Church. Their "Confession de Foi" consisting of Thirty-three Articles, is in harmony with the teaching of the Thirty-nine of the Church of England. At the first service after our arrival, I found 120 persons present, mostly women, the men in the spring of the year being generally absent at sea. Each worshipper on entering supplied himself with a Bible from a heap, collected upon the Communion-table, and on taking his seat, occupied himself with its contents until the Minister opened the service. In this they devoutly joined, giving at the prescribed places a hearty and united Amen ! In their hymns of praise they sang lustily and with good courage. The sermon, which was draughted largely from the wells of salvation, was listened to throughout with unflagging attention. No wandering eye—no yawning lips or nodding head, betrayed an unheeding spirit. Their outward appearance was in keeping with Apostolic teaching. The women were "adorned in modest apparel, with shame-facedness and sobriety—not with braided hair or gold ;" and the men, the poorer in clean comfortable attire, and the richer without the parade of purple and fine linen.

At the Sunday-school I found twenty-six girls present and nine boys. This disparity between the sexes both at the Sunday and day schools, is attributed chiefly to the practice of the fathers of the flock, who are mostly mariners, taking their boys with them to sea as soon as they are capable of the least service. I was as much surprised at the number of verses which one and all had prepared during the previous week, as at the correctness and fluency with which they were repeated. Many had a dozen verses—none less than five, even where their ages did not exceed four or five years. It was sweet to listen to the words of life streaming from such infant lips. One little girl with a Bimba (a babe) in her arms, especially called for my commendation. On passing to the next form so much confusion was caused by the cries of the Bimba, as to induce the remark, that the mother's arms at home was a more befitting place for such a babe than the school-room. Conceive my surprise on being told, that I was the cause of all her noisy outburst, having passed her by without hearing her task ! I could not believe that a suckling, for such she still was, could do more than imperfectly stammer forth its infant wants. For peace sake, however, I bent over her mouth, to approve whatever it might utter. In a moment the little creature, clapping her hands and exchanging grief for joy, began, to my amazement, to utter forth those words which first awakened the wonder of the "Master of Israel,"—"As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up," &c. (John iii. 14—16.) When I reflected that our first memories are undying whispers that reach to the most distant old age, how did I rejoice to think, that in these precious words of the Spirit this babe had a polar-star for all the changing scenes of her future life. And as our first lispings are the most frequent, who shall limit the influence upon the listener of gravest years of her prattle, burthened with "tidings of great joy." "But how," I asked, astonished, "has she acquired the knowledge of these verses?" "Merely," was the reply, "by hearing her sister repeat them during the week." Hear this, ye who would deny capability to the infant mind, and forbid Scripture records to its memory. When her lispings ceased, I could not but exclaim, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise."

The repetitions done, the worthy pastor applied their subject to the children, and then explained and enforced those texts which were their appointed task for the following Sunday. This was done in a way, not only to instruct and interest the children, but to prove under the Spirit's teaching to listening adults, of which many were present, "the power of God unto salvation." Before prayer closed, as it had opened, this afternoon exercise, a doxology was sung by the children. It was angel-music to my soul! For what sweeter charm on earth than infant voices hymning in unison praises to God!

I found in the day-school thirty-nine children, varying in age from four to fourteen. Of this number only nine were boys, and of too tender an age to be capable of general instruction. The morning is devoted to reading, writing, simple arithmetic and geography, and Bible history; the afternoons to useful needlework — an acquirement, by-the-by, which I sought for in vain some years ago in the Society's school at Cairo. The mistress, an approved convert, albeit her husband adheres to Romanism, has long borne an exemplary character, and to the extent of her own information has grounded the children well in elementary knowledge. Their general understanding of the Bible pleased me. The intelligence of some, whom I questioned upon the conduct of Saul in the matter of the Amalekites, was above their years. Order and quiet prevailed. I am not capable of speaking of their needlework, but according to the judgment of another, it was creditable both to the teacher and the taught. During the time of my visit the mothers of the scholars were continually coming in and going out, and showed as much interest in the questions and answers, as though the future welfare of their children depended upon the issue. As the school-room is the basement story of a house and badly ventilated, it is well, the health of the scholars and the growing importance of the school considered, that the building intended for a more enlarged education is rapidly approaching completion.

The evening school, which is limited to the winter months, and is opened to lads from ten years upwards, promises to be one of much usefulness. Although it has only been formed within these four months, it has steadily increased from ten scholars to thirty. Reading, writing, and arithmetic are the subjects taught, and by the pastor himself, who, by-the-by, to his more proper vocation voluntarily adds an active superintendence over and general assistance in all the schools.

When we consider the singular circumstances which gave rise to the brotherhood, the difficulties and trials by which their sincerity has been tested, the sacrifices they have made to secure their worship, and the constancy with which they have adhered to it, we must attribute the whole work to the Spirit of God. Man in no way assisted its birth. It was the testimony of the Spirit to his own revelation. He took of the things of Christ, and wrote them on Cignoni's heart. "The entrance of thy word giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple."

Then again, when we consider the Syndic's testimony to their character, and the passive influence of their life of faith upon the surrounding population, so that opposition is now converted into sympathy, and instead of the lighted faggot at their doors their Bible is welcome in Romish dwellings, we wonder and adore, confessing our belief that the little band is destined to be a light to lighten the whole island, so that the voice of prayer and praise shall rise from its every creek and bay. Nor are these our only reflections. We go a step further, and, considering the growing importance of the mines of Rio Marina, the works that in consequence the Government are projecting for the increase of traffic, the number of dependent smelting localities on the Continent, the increasing multitude of ships which speed hither from every land for its almost inexhaustible ore, whose purity is becoming more known and prized every year,—I say, these things considered, we conclude that Rio will become not only the chief place in the island, but one of importance in the kingdom, and that in consequence this little few are destined to work out some of the great things of God—to play an important part in that drama of which Italy is certain to be the theatre.

The effect of these details upon him who reads, if he be a Christian, and acknowledges the responsibility of his faith, is that of the Macedonian appeal to Paul, "Come over and help us." He will assuredly gather that the Lord has called him by this narrative to assist to the Gospel in Elba. And woe be to him "who seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him."

During our stay we became familiar not only with the history of the church, but of its members. As to their circumstances we found that, though generally poor, very few of them were so destitute as to be wholly dependent upon the industry of the rest. One of these, whom I visited, a "widow indeed," and nearly fourscore years, was bedridden, a martyr to rheumatism, and, alas! stone-blind! I never felt more painfully the helplessness of human sympathy than in the presence of so much woe. As to their moral character, I found full corroboration of the Syndic's testimony. No inconsistency, no irregularity of conduct could be alleged against any of the communicants. Two only of the whole body had, in so long a time, gone back; and in each case, it was the old delusion of a woman hoping by her conversation as a wife, to win over a man as a husband whom she knows to be disobedient to the truth.

Witnessing their "order and stedfastness of faith," my friend's sympathy among them was almost limited to the agreeable task of receiving and counselling the elders as his brethren of a common faith in a common hope. In our last interview with them and their pastor such details were considered with regard to their Christian and Protestant standing as should assist to their general fellowship and development, and secure them from the snares and interference of the Romish Church. This was done in the spirit of the words, "One is your master even Christ, and all ye are brethren," and "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong."

The whole church was assembled at my friend's request. At that interview, after noticing several creditable incidents in the past, he urged upon them love and unity among themselves, meekness and forbearance towards those of a contrary part, so that whether he saw them again or not, he "might hear of their affairs, that they stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel." All were affected by his address, some even to tears. When he rose to depart, a most affecting scene occurred, such as I shall not easily forget. Save that my friend stood, like Saul, head and shoulders above the admiring brethen, I should have lost him, and he perchance have perished in the general embracing rush which followed. Olinto Cignoni flung his brawny arms around him with patriarchal power in patriarchal love, while the holy kisses fell so fast and thick upon his rejoicing face, that, aghast at such an example to the envious crowds which came pressing round, I was alarmed for his safety and mine; for who can tell, I thought, but that such zeal may gather force, and those lusty arms and longing lips find rest on mine to quench the breathing life within me. However, ere such a catastrophe befel, a lull came over the tempest of fondness. My friend survived the shock, and I have escaped to warn my cold reserved countrymen of the warmth and power of Elban love.

I must not close my narrative without some notice, however brief, of Mr. Bonnet, the pastor. Of his piety and zeal there is no doubt, and therewith firm gentleness, which is strengthened by prudent decision. These are qualifications of prime importance in connection with a nascent church in such a locality. Moreover, he has already had successful experience in building up and steadying an infant church. It was his admirable conduct in connection with the church at Pietra Marazzi, that pointed to him as the right man, under critical circumstances, for Rio Marina, albeit to the sacrifice, in some respects, and the general regret of his previous charge. Moreover, he has stored his mind with church history, and is thoroughly versed in its controversial periods and questions. Herein he has already made such happy and discreet use as to merit applause, and give assurance of his success and moderation. The Cardinal Archbishop of Perugia dared to breathe a slander upon his labours in that city, classing him and his faith—his Protestant faith, with the vilest theories and abominations which have disgraced the world. This Goliah of an apostate church had, however, to bow the head before the sling of the Gospel David. Mr. Bonnet's defence and justification should be read in every tongue, not only as showing how simple truth can defend herself against the mighty, but as affording in little more than a summary-form the great facts of Christian history and experience in connection with everlasting truth—the pillar and ground of Protestant faith.

All things come to an end; and so, having satisfied ourselves on the several matters which originally drew us to the island, we rose to depart. A group of the more influential of the flock, all clad in their "Sunday best," gathered round the door of the pastor's house, to bear with sorrowing hearts their patriarch patron down to the boat. From early dawn I had watched its pennon and lateen-sail fluttering in the breeze, impatient of our stay, with feelings akin to sadness, although neither home nor fatherland bound me to the spot. In an age, in a land, in a world where the simple confession of the faith, as once delivered to the saints, was almost lost, we found a brotherhood whose minds were neither beguiled by traditional subtleties, nor corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ—a people holding fast the truth amid abounding error and superstition. My spirit was refreshed, and in consequence the people and the place had become dear to me. Our interest, too, had been awakened towards the general population. Their first reception of us was cold and ungracious, an islander's general welcome to strangers from the continent; now, however, we were never suffered to traverse the public thoroughfares without look or gesture of the kindest courtesy. The simple manners of the people had been favourably brought out by intercourse. Beggars and squalid objects of diseased misery, that, importunate, crowd upon your steps in Italy, are here unseen. Indeed, so salubrious is the place, that hospital and infirmary are alike unknown. No poverty met our eyes in the streets, but everywhere the honest struggle of industry after competence. All this had brought us near to the inner life of the place, still here we had no home, no continuing city, we were strangers and pilgrims among them, and so no wonder we again assumed the sandal-shoon and scallop-shell. The Brethren, mustered at the door, had prepared a chair for conveying my friend down the tedious and difficult descent to the beach. One led the way, holding his crutches aloft as symbols of office and honour, before relief bearers, followed behind by the sturdy few selected to bear on the chair of triumph. His nephew and myself, as beings of lesser note, modestly brought up the rear. As we passed, all the doors and windows of the houses were filled with kindly greeting faces, shaded with sadness. Although, as we broke down the steep and slippery streets, the chair swayed at times, I had no fear for my friend's safety. I knew the sturdy muscles which bore him high were nerved with vigorous love. His honest face, that had never betrayed fear, was flushed with satisfaction now, as he looked secure around him; a deeper satisfaction, a holier flush, than once prevailed, when applauding crowds bore him from the contest victor for his country's councils. As we neared the beach the red-skinned facchini looked as savage as on our arrival—busy at the same toil, and animated by the same monotonous cries. We expected no breath of cheer or goodwill from them to swell our canvas from the shore, and so were not disappointed. As we stood at last by the side of our vessel, and contrasted these dusky savages with the sober, orderly-looking Brethren clustered around us with a sad and last farewell, my heart sunk within me—the contrast was so sad and striking. Surely we were leaving a few gentle sheep to be worried and devoured by famished wolves. Barletta was too recent and too terrible to be forgotten then. However, I rallied from alarm, when I reflected that these, though many, were but the refuse of the whole—that the Syndic, supported by sufficient force, was pledged to the protection of the brethren—that the bulk and better part of the population were at least their sure, though silent friends; and above all, that the power and faithfulness of the great Shepherd of the sheep were their guaranteed succour: and so we "commended them to God and to the word of his grace." The busy and crowded shore, with the facchini yelling unfriendly around, was no scene for tears and prayers such as once and for all time sanctified the shores of Miletus. Sorrow was as much saddening us as the Brethren who had accompanied us to the ship. The suprema verba were given, and then in a moment they disappeared among the hillocks of iron ore that rise around the shore. Our sail flew to the breeze, broad and full, as the steersman bent o'er the rudder. Away we sped over the blue waves crisping before the wind, and babbling in joyous wavelets round the cleaving bows. On, still on we flew, lessening instant by instant all traces of the past, till we reached the mainland, now resounding everywhere with the shouts, and hurried march of battalions rushing to war. Women were tending flocks, and cultivating fields, abandoned by their husbands, armed for the strife. Man was run riot for his brother's blood, and was about to leave a desolate wilderness behind him, where now plains spread before us pleasant as the garden of the Lord. What a sequel, but what a motive was this to our mission of brotherhood and peace!

BLACKETT BOTCHERBY.

WORDS IN A BARN.

IT has pleased our God once more graciously to crown the year with his goodness, and that far above what we have been able to think or pray for, and very much above what we have deserved. The treasures with which He has clothed our fields have been so abundant that we could scarcely find hands enough to carry them all into the barn. Wherever we turned our eyes all things united in calling out to us:—"O taste and see that the Lord is good."

We read in one of the Gospels a parable of a man whose ground had brought forth plentifully, and who said to himself:—"I will pull down my barns and build greater, and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods." Our fields and our barns really resemble those of that man. Oh! let us watch and pray that we may not resemble him in his resolution to make idols of the received benefits, lest we too, in eating, drinking, and making merry, forget the love of the Divine Giver in the enjoyment of his perishable gifts. May we never forget that all these blessings, countless and excellent as they are, are only temporal additions to the one all-surpassing gift with which He has blessed us in Jesus Christ, viz., his kingdom and righteousness. This day, with its innumerable bounties, confirms that saying of the Gospel:—"He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?"

In the abundance which now surrounds us there is much that may make us forget the source from which that abundance has flown down to us. We see the gifts, but the Giver we see not. If we have no heart to observe more than what we see with our eyes and touch with our hands, everything soon becomes sensuous and mechanical to us. It seems as if the whole creation were but a great self-acting machine, as if everything came of and by itself. We dropt the precious grain into the soil, the sun regularly rose and set, the rain and the dew came down to moisten the soil, and the sunshine sweetly fostered the seed, gradually the blade pierced the clod and grew up naturally into the ear, which contained the blessed nourishment for man and beast. All this, apparently, went on as steadily and uninterruptedly as though it had been regulated by some mighty clockwork; indeed, as though man were the only intelligent being who had anything to do with it. This might easily tempt us to believe that it was all the result of our own ability, skill, and industry. There are, alas! many people who think so, or at least seem to think so. Some of these are even sagacious and learned. They say that the blessed harvest which we have been gathering in, is merely the result of the action of the eternal laws which obtain in Creation, and that man himself is only a somewhat finer machine, driven and constantly regulated by those same eternal laws. But sagacious and learned as those people may be, they are yet like to the brutes, which eat and drink and know not Him that made them and gives them their food day by day. It is true that everything here below moves and acts according to natural laws, but where there are laws there must also be a Lawgiver, who made those laws and uses them according to his wisdom and for his purposes. We cannot see that wonderful Lawgiver, but we see his work; and if, unlike the brutes, we are rational beings, with thinking heads and feeling hearts, we cannot but marvel at the skill, the power, the wisdom, and the love with which all these various laws work harmoniously together to produce the myriad small grains of corn and wheat, or to make the stately tree start forth from the tiny seed to bear its sweet refreshing fruits which "fill our hearts with food and gladness." So we will rejoice in Him now. We will thank and praise Him, because all the blessings which at present gladden our hearts are his work and his gift. We will say :—"Some of us have planted and some have reaped, but God gave the increase."

But it was very kind of our God that He did not do the work wholly alone ; that He allowed us to be his fellow-labourers. This is indeed a great honour, which we should thankfully appreciate. The harvest is a reward which our Heavenly Father has kindly allowed as the result of our work. Without that work not one grain of corn would have blessed our fields. This is an important fact. It is perfectly true that without God's blessing all our work is in vain. But it is equally true that, as a rule, without our work God cannot bless us. It has pleased our kind Creator so to arrange matters in this world that work is the channel through which blessing flows to us. And a wise arrangement it is, for the proverb says rightly that idleness is the devil's pillow. Look, for instance, at those unhappy persons who through their wealth are able to live without working. Instead of imposing some useful labour upon themselves, as they might so easily do, they waste their precious lifetime in mere self-enjoyment, and in doing nothing worth doing. But observe how soon they get satiated and disgusted with everything, even with their cherished pleasures, and turn either profligates and debauchees, or ill-tempered, fickle, crotchety and grumbling truants —a nuisance to others, and a burden to themselves. Or look at those pitiable wretches, who, though they have hands to work with, are yet too indolent to give themselves any trouble, and prefer living upon other people, or turn beggars and swindlers. Such people, dear friends, know nothing of the joy of a blessed harvest. For if they, too, have a harvest, it is that of an evil conscience and a bad reputation. Work is a divine occupation, for our Lord says, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." And to rejoice in the success of a blessed harvest is a divine enjoyment ; for God is glorified when the work of his hands bears much fruit.

But everything has a shady side here below, and so had our work, of which we are at present reaping the fruits. It has cost us many a sweat-drop. Sometimes it was very painful and wearisome, and sometimes it was disappointing and unsuccessful. It was not always a cheerful, sunny day that found us in the fields. We had to endure many a storm and shower. It was not always under the refreshing shadow of oak or beech that we did our work. We had often to bear the heat of the day, which made us almost faint, like Jonah, when he said :—"It is better for me to die than to live." Sometimes our work made our limbs ache, and sometimes we were even laid aside with illness. In short, dear friends, we have experienced that we were not working inside, but outside the garden of Eden. In the midst of the countless blessings of God's grace we have felt the "thorns and thistles," of which God spoke to our first parent when He said to him, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake ; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life ; thorns also, and thistles shall it bring forth to thee ; . . . in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Our being a working people testifies to our resemblance to God, who also is a working God ; but it is equally true that the painfulness and the hardships of our work testify to our resemblance to that fallen man, who, through sin, brought the burden of toil and care upon himself and his posterity. Wholesome and delightful as labour often is, yet, taken as a whole, and in the long run, it is burdensome and oppressive. What a man of God said four thousand years ago is still true :—"The strength of our years is labour and sorrow." One day I met a labourer on the field, a hale, venerable-looking old man, evidently pleased with the work which was prosperously progressing under his hands. I observed, however, that his active spade had to struggle with many obstinate impediments.

"Well, old friend," I said to him, "I am glad to see you enjoying your noble battle."

"Ay, sir," he answered, leaning on his spade and wiping the sweat from his brow ; "I like it pretty well ; but still I am glad to know that there will be an end of it."

"So then, you would not wish it to continue for ever ?" I asked.

"Why, sir," he replied ; "I am fond of work, thank God, but I am glad I am going to a land where the work will not make my back ache nor my face sweat."

Indeed, dear friends, without such a prospect all labour here below is only a burden and a cross. The pains and sorrows connected with our work, while reminding us that we have lost Paradise, ought at the same time to make us fix the eye of our faith and hope more firmly and thankfully on Christ, as He has regained it for us through his blood and tears. This hope should cheer us up under the difficulties and troubles of our daily cares, which so often mar the happiness of our life. It should make us patient and resigned when good work gets spoiled, or good plans, carried out with great care and sacrifice, fall to the ground. To those who labour in this spirit no work can be fruitless, even though they should not see the fruits of it in this life. We may this year thankfully rejoice in an abundant harvest, but we can remember years when our barns were left all but empty. We are not assured that such distressing harvest times will never return ; but we have always wherewith to console and to encourage ourselves in Jesus Christ our Lord. The harvest which we see with our eyes, and touch with our hands, is not the true and real harvest of a Christian's work. That true and real harvest is stored up in better barns than those of wood, brick, and mortar. It will be seen stored in the barns which our heavenly Father has built in his everlasting Paradise. It can never be lost to those who labour here below in the faith and love of their Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Let us rejoice at the sight of the present harvest, dear friends, but let us at the same time rejoice in the spirit of humility. I have said that the present blessings may be looked upon as a reward for our work, but surely they are not a reward for our own righteousness. This is the place to humble ourselves in the dust before our God, and to say with Jacob : "We are less than the least of all these Thy benefits."

If we feel as we ought to feel, our well-filled barns will be like coals of fire heaped upon our heads. All over the country during the past year heaven has dropped fatness ; the pastures were clothed with flocks, the fields and valleys were covered with corn. God has, indeed, dealt with the people as if there were no sinner amongst them, as if not one of his commandments had been broken. And yet, if only one day of the year were to arise as a witness, and give an account of all the deeds that have been done and all the words that have been spoken, both in private and in public, what a sad tale would it be ! I remember reading of a very wicked farmer, who went one day to the neighbouring village to buy a new cart-rope, as he was doubtful whether the old one would be strong enough for the harvest loads. As he was returning home, with the new rope in his hand, he passed by a poor but godly old man, sitting by the way-side, who looked with peculiar attention at the rope. The wicked farmer, on noticing this, stopped and asked the old patriarch why he looked so intently at it. "Because I never witnessed such an evidence as this rope is that we are living in the year of grace," was the answer. "Why?" asked the farmer. "Because, sir, under the law it was said : 'Woe unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity and sin as it were with a cart-rope ;' but I see that we are now living in a time when people, after having drawn sin in that way, want a new cart-rope to draw home God's blessings. This strikes me, sir, as a palpable proof that God is a God of long-suffering and slow to anger." I don't know what impression these words of the old man made upon the wicked farmer, but perhaps there are some amongst us now whom this story may strike as peculiarly applicable to themselves. We read in the Book of Ruth of a farmer who, on entering his field on the harvest-day, said to the reapers : "The Lord be with you ;" and the reapers answered : "The Lord bless thee." This little bit of conversation gives us a touching glimpse of the spirit in which that farmer and his people were wont to carry on their work. Nor can we wonder to find that the continuation of the story shows that both the farmer and his reapers were good, kindhearted persons, who sympathised with the poor, supported the weak, and revered unprotected innocence. I am afraid there are many farmers and reapers in our time regarding whom it would be difficult to give such honourable testimony. The conversation which now-a-days is usually carried on in the harvest-field is such that it would sound like profaneness to begin it by saying, "The Lord be with you," or to close it by saying, "The Lord bless you." We also read in the Book of Ruth that there were vessels with wine on the field to quench the thirst of the reapers, and it appears that anyone who was athirst was permitted to go to these vessels and draw ; but we do not read that anyone got drunk. I greatly fear that, were that practice introduced into our fields, the carts would be required to carry the reapers home instead of the corn.

Truly the blessings of God which are manifest on this harvest-day are countless ; but what comes nearest to them in number is our sins, with which we reward every day the mercy and long-suffering of our heavenly Benefactor. Let us try not to overlook or to forget that sad, mortifying truth, dear friends, but rather open our hearts to listen to the voice which on this blessed day sounds into our ears, "Do not despise the riches of God's forbearance and long-suffering, but allow the goodness of God to lead thee to repentance." Our well-filled barns tell us a tale that ought to go home to our hearts. Another tale might have been told to us by blighted crops, wasted fields, inundations, mildew, thunderstorms, and other fearful calamities. A great famine might have been staring us in the face, and, instead of being a day of joy, this might have been one of deepest distress. And if God had brought such a visitation upon us, could we have accused Him of injustice? No, assuredly not. Nothing would have been left to us but to acknowledge that we had fully deserved it, and to cry for mercy. But observe now, God in his immeasurable grace has not taken this course with us. He desires to speak kindly to us. He has no pleasure in the death of any one of us, but rather desires that we should turn from our ways and live. He gives time for consideration. Here are his innumerable blessings filling our hearts with food and gladness. He whispers into our souls these sweet words : "See how I love thee ; and I have given thee even better things than all these : why, then, shouldst thou stray far away from me and die? Come to me and love me : these things are only my perishable gifts ; am I not much better than all of them?" Certainly He is. But our conscience-stricken hearts answer : "How can I come to thee? for I am a sinner, and thou art holy and just." But here our blessed Lord Jesus Christ steps in with the blood of the covenant drawn from his own veins. He beareth testimony to that saying that God has given us better things than the bread that perishes. If any one of us, on seeing the loving-kindness of God on this day of blessing and beneficence, desires to go to the great Giver himself, and to make a firm covenant with Him for time and for eternity, a new and living way is opened up through that all-sufficient Mediator, to the fountain for sin and uncleanness. The abundant blessings of the day, though they cannot save, call us to Him who is as able as He is willing to save. If anyone now present is not in Him, let him hasten to fly to Him, for this may be the last harvest we shall be permitted to enjoy. Perhaps our time may be short and the series of God's blessings drawing to a close. Let us therefore, dear friends, not be careless, but consider. May this day of blessing never rise up as a witness against those amongst us who have not yet given up their hearts to Jesus, but may it be the birthday of a new life, from which the angels of God will some day reap a harvest far better and more precious than that which we are now thankfully enjoying.

And I trust, dear friends, that there are amongst us those who regard the present harvest as a kind answer of God to their prayers. It is a sad truth that many, very many, of those who every day receive their bread from the hand of God, yet never pray for it. This does not by any means argue that prayer is unnecessary, but only that our Father which is in Heaven is a merciful God, making his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sending rain on the just and on the unjust. Prayer spreads its blessings over a wide area. It is like the light, which casts its lustre over a large company, though but one of them lit the candle. Many who never pray are often blessed for the sake of one who does. We read in Bible history of a whole nation which, but for the prayer of one man, would have been destroyed; we also read of a famine by which a country was stricken for three years, and which was only stopped because one faithful servant of God was constant in prayer. I do not believe that a harvest would ever spring up from the dark earth if nobody prayed it down from heaven. I do not mean by this that we can make ourselves deserving of a good harvest by offering up prayers: this were to speak as though our good Lord in Heaven were a large corn merchant, and prayer a piece of coin for which He sells to us according to value; nor do I mean to say that a man who prays, but does not sow, is a better farmer than the man who sows but does not pray; but what I mean is, that we have been doing no fruitless or superfluous thing when we have humbly knelt down and whispered in faith, "Give us each day our daily bread!" I believe that such whispers have had a decided bearing on the present harvest, though I am not able to tell how it was so. Prayer is the spiritual telegraph, and as we are not yet initiated into all the secrets of the heavenly telegraphy, we cannot be surprised at witnessing powerful effects which we cannot clearly explain. The efficacy of a Christian's prayer, not only with reference to spiritual matters, but to temporal blessings also, is not a matter for logic and argumentation. Its marvellous efficacy must be believed in on the authority of God's word. God assures us that He hears prayer, and that the prayer of the righteous availeth much. It is often difficult for us creatures of flesh and blood to believe this, but we should strive earnestly against that unbelief which puts away the truth, and even makes light of it. An unprayed-for harvest is not nearly so rich and lovely in the eyes of a good man, as a prayed-for one. A child and a slave both eat of the same bread, provided by the same hand, but to the child it tells quite a different tale from what it does to the slave. To the child it is the gift of a loving father, whom he sees and talks with every day in sweetest confidential intimacy; to the slave it is but the daily allowance of one whom he calls his master, but whom he seldom sees and more seldom speaks to. May we all of us be able to look upon the harvest as beloved children, to whom the great invisible Giver is no stranger or task-master, but a father and a friend, who gladdens us with the gifts for which we have often asked in childlike confidence.

Indeed, when looking in this spirit on the blessings which surround us, they reflect to us the loving attributes of Him who gives them. To the eye of faith the harvest is, as it were, a mirror of God's character. It speaks of love and loving-kindness. It must be a delightful thing to know, to be a child of, and to dwell in constant communion with a Being who finds a pleasure in calling forth such choice refreshments for his creatures. True, it is his nature to chasten the refractory, to punish the evil doer, and to revenge the oppressor; but his heart's pleasure is to bless, to make happy, to fill heaven and earth with joy. And right well He knows how to find the means to call forth joy. With what surprising skill and foresight does He prepare such provisions as exactly answer our wants, please our taste, and gladden our hearts. What a large-hearted munificence is displayed in the countless variety of fruits, and in the immeasurable abundance of everything that can contribute to the happiness and comfort of our life. Our bread is not scantily measured out to us, but the store-rooms of heaven are thrown open, and the country is covered with corn and fruits of all kinds, so that there seems no end of the ingathering. Truly He is a God who giveth plentifully and upbraideth not. His is not the heart of the miser, of the calculating taskmaster, of the narrow-minded churl. He is a king, royal, generous, and munificent in all his doings. We put one grain into the soil, and He blesses it so that it multiplies and springs up six, ten, even twenty-fold. A child thrusts a cherry-stone into the ground, and a tree springs up clad with juicy fruit. We send our cattle into the field and place the beehive in the garden; and lo! streams of milk and honey flow through the land. It is true a severe plague visited our herds this year, but his is the earth and the fulness thereof, and as though to compensate for our lack He has blessed other countries with all the greater abundance. There is no searching out of his understanding and no limit to his power, and who can fathom the depth or scale the height of his goodness towards the creatures of his hands?

If, then, dear friends, we look with wonder at the rich abundance wherewith God has blessed us, let us at the same time understand that God has set us an example to imitate. Let us not merely ask how to enjoy ourselves; but also how to make others enjoy. Our Heavenly Father shows us that true love is that noble disposition of the heart, which finds its pleasure in the pleasure of others. To our selfish nature this is a hard lesson to learn. Nor have we learnt much of it in the school of the master whom, alas! we adopted when we fell from the favour of our Creator. It is true there are persons who, though they care little for God and his service, yet, from a merry, jovial kind of temper, or from an innate good-humour, try to make everybody they meet gay and cheerful. But upon close examination it will be found that this sort of munificence, as a rule, does not proceed from nobility of principle, but from weakness of character. Often, indeed, it requires the stimulus of strong drink to bring it into operation. To make other people happy merely that we may the more enjoy them, is a thing quite different from making others happy because we love them. The former is carnal and selfish, the latter is noble and God-like. But that lax, ill-principled generosity is on the whole not the ruling passion of our race. We are naturally more inclined towards the contrary. We usually try to make ourselves as comfortable as we can, and to allow others to help themselves. We often make Cain's saying, "Am I my brother's keeper?" our motto when we little think of it. If, for instance, this year's crops had been placed under the absolute administration of any one of us, I am very much afraid that in the annals of this country this harvest would have been marked as the poorest ever witnessed. When distributing to others we are much inclined to ask, "How little will do?" but when distributing to ourselves we ask, "How much can I keep?" Our opinion evidently is that God may safely trust his benefits to us, but that we ought to be very chary of trusting our benefits to others. Some of us hoard up our money in dark corners, rather than allow it to circulate for the benefit of society. Some again spend it profusely, but mainly upon objects from which nobody save themselves draw any enjoyment. Then some try to squeeze the largest possible profit out of other people's work by paying them the smallest possible wages; and others would refuse to give their neighbour even so much as a cup of cold water except they were in one way or another to be paid or rewarded for it.

Dear friends, the harvest teaches us better things than these. Those of us who are led by such a selfish narrow-minded spirit, may now learn how very unlike they are to Him who every day spreads their table for them, and fills their cup with abundance. Let us learn from Him how to live and at the same time let others live; how to rejoice and at the same time make others rejoice. Our God is not only a giver, but a cheerful giver. He not only prepares for us a profuse repast, but He also provides a feathered chorus to sing while we partake of it, and furnishes a dazzling variety of flowers to adorn our table. Now such manifestations of his kind and amiable character should speak to our hearts, should fill us with a loving, liberal, generous, and cheerful spirit. And if anyone should ask which is the best way to get our hearts opened that such a spirit as this may enter, I would answer that I know no other way but cordial faith in Jesus Christ, in whom far better and still richer gifts than all these are presented to us; in whom not only this earth and the fulness thereof, but the everlasting treasures of heaven are freely given to us. For we cannot possibly make others truly happy and cheerful so long as we ourselves are unsaved and tremble at the thought of the coming day: nor can we be truly liberal and generous until we are truly rich and truly kingly. Christ makes his friends heirs of God, and joint heirs with Himself. If in our heart we believe that, and look upon ourselves as the owners, through grace, of such an immeasurable inheritance, we will certainly feel like kings—we cannot continue to fret, grumble, and quarrel about such trifles as silver and gold, or about such vain things as human glory and worldly profits. Our hearts will then have become too large for that, since they embrace nothing short of heaven itself, with all the riches of its everlasting and inexhaustible store.

This is a great harvest-day. Another still greater harvest-day is at hand, on which the angels will be the reapers; and each one of us is a field or a vineyard to which the great Husbandman will come to gather the fruits of what has been sown in us during our lifetime.

I pray God that that great harvest-day may, to every one of us, prove a day of great rejoicing.

HEROES AND MARTYRS OF THE REFORMATION IN ITALY.

V.—PIETRO CARNESECCHI.

Fiorenze la bella, "Florence the beautiful," occupies a more illustrious place in the history of the world than she does in that of the Church. Poets have justly celebrated the beauty of her situation—"Girt by her theatre of hills," and resting in the bosom of the rich valley through which "the smiling Arno creeps;" historians have recorded with vivid pen the story of her commercial enterprise, the struggles of her people for liberty, the varying fortunes of her state, and the strangely mingled baseness and nobleness which marked the character of some of her leading citizens; the lover of art is lost in ecstacies as he surveys the treasures with which her galleries and churches and streets are filled; and the scholar dwells with a sense of triumph on the part she had in the revival of letters, and recalls the days of Lorenzo the Magnificent and the Platonic Academy with an enthusiasm which makes him often forget that the former was a heartless and licentious tyrant, and that the latter was as much a temple of paganism as a school of learning. But to the historian of Christianity, Florence furnishes few materials of interest. Yet even for him she is not without memorable associations. Beneath the roof of her majestic Duomo the voice of Savonarola pealed forth its stirring utterances, denouncing the Divine wrath on the corruptors of the Church and the oppressors of the people, and summoning men of all classes to penitence, to mutual peace and good-will, and to a holy, God-honouring life. To one of her sons, Antonio Brucciolo, Italy is indebted for the first translation of the Holy Scriptures from the originals into the vernacular language of the people. And within her walls were born Pietro Carnesecchi and Peter Martyr Vermigli, than whom no nobler names are to be found among the confessors of the truth in Italy at the time of the Reformation.

The exact date of Carnesecchi's birth has not been ascertained. If, as Gerdesius asserts,* he had for his preceptor Francisco Robortello, who was born in 1516,† we cannot place the birth of Carnesecchi earlier than that year; for, seeing his education was not neglected in early life, it may be presumed that he would not be placed as a lad under the instructions of a tutor younger than himself. It may be doubted, however, whether Gerdesius is correct in this statement. It is in itself improbable, and it obliges us to fix a date for Carnesecchi's birth later than subsequent facts in his history justify. One fact alone seems decisive on this point; Carnesecchi held high office and exerted great influence at the Court of Pope Clement VII. But Clement died in 1534, when Carnesecchi, supposing him of the same age as Robortello, would have been only eighteen years old, and consequently incapable of occupying an official position of authority at the Papal Court. It is more probable that he was born in the closing decade of the fifteenth century.

Of patrician descent, Carnesecchi was from the beginning liberally educated, and was early introduced to the most cultivated and dignified society of his native city. His abilities, his culture, the elegance of his person, and the urbanity of his manners procured him the favour of the most illustrious personages. De Thou tells us that he enjoyed relations of intimacy with the Medici, and was long held in high esteem by Marguerite, the wife of the Duke of Savoy.* He obtained the friendship of Bembo and the praise of Sadolet, who mentions him as "a young man of distinguished virtue and liberal accomplishments."† His intimacy with the Medici family brought him under the notice of Clement VII., who was a member of that family; and by him he was made apostolical protonotary, and endowed with two abbacies, one in Naples the other in France. The duties of his office were very much those of private secretary to the Pope, with whom he was thus brought into constant and confidential intercourse. Such was the feeling with which he inspired his chief, that he repeatedly offered to make him a Cardinal, and such the influence he acquired by the fidelity, diligence, and ability with which he discharged the functions of his office, that it came to be commonly said that the Pontificate at that time was conducted rather by Carnesecchi than by Clement.‡

After the death of Clement, Carnesecchi spent some years in travelling through Italy, that he might gratify his literary tastes by the society of men eminent for learning and abilities. It was whilst at Naples with this view, in 1540, that he became acquainted with Juan Valdez, and was drawn by him to the study of the sacred writings, and to earnest religious thought and consideration. Of an open, candid, and inquiring mind, he apprehended the truth as taught by Valdez, and yielded himself to the convictions that were pressed upon him both by the teaching of that earnest reformer and the conversations and discussions that engrossed the attention of the circle of eminent persons of which he was the centre. The result was that Carnesecchi became thoroughly imbued with the reformed doctrines, and to these he retained his attachment to the last, though still retaining his place and preferments in the Church of Rome.

After the death of Valdez, Carnesecchi betook himself to Viterbo, where Cardinal Pole had drawn around him a number of persons interested in religious inquiries, and in earnest to possess themselves of the truth as taught in Scripture. Here he was associated with Marc Antonio Flaminio, Vergerio, Soranzo Bishop of Bergamo, and others whom a popish annalist classes as "Valdensian, Lutheran, Zwinglian, and Calvinistic heretics."* The same writer adds that he had intercourse also with Baldassare Altieri, whom he describes as "a Lutheran apostate, holding communication with the Protestants of Germany, and having a monopoly of heretical books;" but who occupies an honourable place as one who laboured and suffered much for the cause of truth in Venetia. The men with whom Carnesecchi associated at this time must be regarded as to a certain extent his teachers; but his vigorous intellect and open candour helped him to outstrip in knowledge some who "were in Christ before him," while his moral courage enabled him to stand fast when others wavered, trimmed, or finally went back to the errors they had professed to renounce. Flaminio, whose abilities and learning fitted him to take the lead in such a society and in such pursuits, appears to have acted as a sort of lecturer to the "Santa e utila Compagnia," as Pole describes it in a letter written at the time;† and this duty he seems to have discharged well, "to the great consolation and edification" of the hearers. But there was a point at which Flaminio stopped short, while the decision, firmness, and courage of Carnesecchi carried him onwards. Flaminio, scholarly and diffident, was awed by reverence for tradition and the authority of the Catholic Church, which prevented his following the clear teaching of Scripture when it led to conclusions opposed to the dogmas and usages sanctioned by Rome. Among other questions on which he and Carnesecchi had conversed at Viterbo was that relating to the sacrifice of the Mass and the dogma of Transubstantiation. The progress of Lutheran and Zwinglian opinions regarding the Eucharist filled Flaminio with pain and anxiety, and dreading that his friend was infected with the notions of those "execrable sects," he wrote him, after they had separated, a long letter from Trent, dated 1st Jan., 154$\frac{3}{4}$. In this, after entreating Carnesecchi to read some books which he mentions, he proceeds to urge the argument from antiquity in support of the Romanist view of the Eucharist. For this purpose he adduces and dwells on the testimony of Irenæus as proving that "the early Church held that in the Eucharist the body and blood of Christ are really present, that there is an oblation of the body and blood of Christ under the species of bread and wine, and that this was introduced by Christ and his Apostles." He then appeals to the universality of this belief all over the Christian world, and denounces the temerity of those who venture to set themselves in opposition to the accordant judgment and teaching of the Church in all places and from the age of the Apostles downwards. He asserts that Bucer, after having been one of the most zealous adherents of the Zwinglian doctrines, ultimately recanted, and returned to the ancient faith;‡ and he concludes by inviting his friend to join him in humbly casting themselves before God, and exhorting him not to be persuaded by any reason, however plausible it may seem, to separate from the Catholic Church, lest they be cast on those dangerous rocks and make shipwreck. "Let us say," he exclaims, "with David, 'Show me thy way, O Lord, and teach me thy paths, for thou art the God of my salvation,' and we shall doubtless be heard; for good and right is God, and He will guide the meek in judgment; He will teach the meek his ways. If we are determined to judge of divine things by human disputation, we shall without God be refuted, and in these contentious times we shall be so attached to one party and so pursuing with hate another, that we shall utterly lose judgment and charity, and esteem darkness light and light darkness, and persuading ourselves that we are rich and blessed, we shall be poor, and wretched, and miserable, not knowing how to separate the precious from the vile, a knowledge which the Spirit of Christ alone can teach, to whom be glory for ever. Amen."

To this letter, the spirit of which it is impossible not to admire, Carnesecchi wrote a lengthened reply, a copy of which has fortunately escaped the general destruction of his papers. In this, after acknowledging the kindness of Flaminio's intention in writing to him, and the courtesy that characterised what he had written, he proceeds to deal with his arguments. To the authority of Irenaeus he attaches great weight; but contends that the testimony of that writer goes only to assert the observance of the Eucharist in the Church, and that it is only to put a false meaning on his words to say that they refer to the Mass, a term of later and barbarous origin. He then cites from some of the Fathers passages in which the Sacrament of the Supper is set forth as an oblation and a sacrifice much more decidedly than by Irenaeus; but he argues that the language they use is rhetorical, and ought not to have a dogmatical sense affixed to it. He then shows that the doctrine taught in the early Church concerning the sacrifices of Christians was that these sacrifices are to be those of praise, and their oblation that of themselves wholly unto God. "The hinge of the controversy," he says, "turns on whether Transubstantiation or the more recent Consubstantiation is a doctrine sanctioned by proper authority." "Does Irenaeus," he asks a hearer of those who had been disciples of the Apostles, "say a word of these? or are they mentioned by any later author while as yet the sanctity of the religion remained inviolate? I know," he proceeds to say, "that you cannot adduce one till you come down to very troubled times, the age of Pope Gregory I., and of Charlemagne, when they began to use the word transelementatio, and to speak of a certain inexplicable change of the bread and wine, a change of grace not of nature, whereby the bread and wine truly remains bread and wine, though no longer common, but hallowed and blessed. What, I pray, is this? Do we knowingly and willingly choose to err, or blind to follow blind leaders? If ever there was a defection from the dogma and discipline of the Catholic Church it is this." Having in this way replied to the reasoning of his friend, he concludes by refering to the angry charges and insults heaped on those who sought to revert to the doctrine of the primitive Church on this head. Those who utter such charges ought, if they had any sense, to consider that no reproaches and accusations are so futile and ridiculous as those which either recoil or may be easily thrown back on those from whom they proceed. Even Flaminio himself had in his letter denounced the obstinacy of those who blindly remain in their opinion, their pride concealed under a false zeal, their arrogance and their condemnation of general and perpetual usage. But by thus throwing abuse at each other nothing is decided. "Wherefore let us consider what is true, right, and praiseworthy, what behoves and ought to be done; not what is done by this one or that one; and by the same rule let us pronounce as well concerning things themselves as, if we will, concerning persons."

Whilst this letter of Carnesecchi is inferior to that of Flaminio in composition, the Latin being harsh and rugged, it shows how clearly he had apprehended the true course which it behoves the inquirer to follow in order to ascertain the truth in regard to any of the doctrines and institutions of Christianity, and how much he was in advance of his friend in point of spiritual enlightenment and mental freedom. The differences of opinion which subsisted between them, discussed in this candid and generous manner, produced no alienation of affection on either side. Friends they continued to the last, and though Flaminio never so decidedly connected himself with the Reformers as did Carnesecchi, there can be no doubt that he came to be on most points at one with them, and that, as he grew older, he attached himself more and more closely to them. Of his feelings towards Carnesecchi we may judge from the language in which he addresses him in a poem, written about this time, when Flaminio had to bid his friend farewell, in consequence of being summoned by his sovereign to go on a distant embassy.

"Though from thy sight constrained to part,
Obedient to my sovereign's will,
I'll bear thee with me in my heart,
Thy charms shall hover round me still.

"No lapse of time, no change of place,
Not death itself, best, dearest friend,
Can from my soul thy form efface,
Or bid our sweet communion end." *

From this time Carnesecchi was in close and continual intercourse with the Reformers, and the friends of letters. His house was the resort of all to whom evangelical religion and learning were dear; he exercised a generous hospitality to all good men who visited him; and he maintained correspondence with those who, in other parts, were suffering for the cause of truth, and sent them pecuniary aid. One of his chief correspondents, and one by whom his benevolent efforts on behalf of the destitute were most liberally aided, was the Duchess Giulia da Gonzaga, and not improbably it was from her he obtained the pension by which Isabella da Manricha was supported when she had forsaken all for Christ.

It was not possible to pursue a course like this without incurring odium with the adherents of the Papal authority. The steps which the latter had taken to prevent the spread of heresy in Italy had led to the flight of Ochino and Peter Martyr; and shortly after this, Carnesecchi was, in 1546, apprehended and subjected to the scrutiny of the Cardinal de Burgos as one suspected of heretical pravity. The charges laid against him were that he kept up correspondence with proscribed heretics, that he recommended to Giulia da Gonzaga heretical ministers and pseudo-apostles, that he had expended his ecclesiastical benefices on heretics, who had fled to the other side of the mountains, &c. Whether Carnesecchi denied the charges brought against him, as Laderchi says, or whether, as Gerdes with more probability asserts, the easy nature and mild disposition of the Pope, Paul III., stood him in stead, the result was, that for this time he escaped. Not deeming it safe, however, to remain in Italy, he retired to France, where, after spending some time with Margaret of Savoy, who was favourable to the reformed doctrines, he settled at Paris, under the protection of Catherine de' Medici, queen of Henry II. Whilst in France his intercourse with persons holding the reformed doctrines, and his study of the sacred Scriptures, as well as of the works of some of the leading Reformers, tended greatly to confirm and establish him in his attachment to their views. In 1552 he returned to Italy, and lived first at Venice and then at Padua, where he could enjoy greater immunity from Roman hostility than in any other part of Italy. Though striving to avoid all occasions of offence, he was not suffered by his enemies to remain in peace. During the pontificate of Julius III., by whom Paul III. had been succeeded, he was not molested; but the death of that pontiff and his short-lived successor, opened the way for the succession of one of a very different temper from either of his two immediate predecessors, the Cardinal Caraffa, who, under the title of Paul IV., assumed the tiara in 1555. Before his elevation a friend of Erasmus and the humanists, and the opponent of the Jesuits, he was no sooner seated in the papal chair than he entered into alliance with that body, and appeared anxious by the severity of his measures against the Reformers to atone for his earlier tamperings with the party of progress. By him Carnesecchi was cited to appear before the Inquisition to answer for his heretical doings and leanings. Having no hope that such favour as had been shown to him by Paul III. would be extended to him by his successor, Carnesecchi deemed it prudent to decline the summons; for which he was excommunicated by the Pope. Under this ban he rested till the accession of Pius IV., who, being a member of the Medici family, was prevailed on by his relative the Duke Cosmo to repeal the sentence which had been pronounced against him, and to confirm the sentence of absolution granted by Paul III. Laderchi complains that, notwithstanding the clemency thus showed him, Carnesecchi persisted in his former course, studying heretical books, aiding with money men guilty of heresy, corresponding with heretics and using means to disseminate heretical opinions among the people. All this doubtless is true; and, known and noted at Rome, his enemies only waited for a favourable occasion to bring it up against him and secure his destruction.

* "Ode ad Petrum Carnesecum," preserved by Schelhorn, Ergötzlichkeiten i. 194.

Meanwhile Carnesecchi had removed to his native Florence, and placed himself under the protection of the reigning Duke. Priding himself on being a patron of letters and learned men, Cosmo gladly extended his protection to one who was not only a scholar, an orator, and a poet, but a hereditary protégé of the Medicean house, and a man of refined taste and genial manners. Carnesecchi entered cordially into all the Duke's schemes of literary enterprise, and speedily rose to a high place in the favour of his patron. The eye of papal hostility was, however, still upon him, and it was soon found that neither the walls of his native city nor the favour of its sovereign was to avail to protect him from the vengeance of his persecutors.

Cosmo de' Medici was one of those men who, supremely solicitous for their own ease and indulgence, are not unwilling that others should enjoy the same advantages, provided this can be attained without annoyance to themselves. For a season he resisted the attempts of the directors of the Inquisition to establish that terrible power within his domain, and for a season he threw the shield of his protection around Carnesecchi. But, finding that he could not pursue this course without compromising his reputation as a good Catholic, and thereby getting himself into trouble, he relinquished the struggle, and abandoned his people to the tender mercies of the persecutor. Florence was overwhelmed with a flood of eager inquisitors, on the hunt for heretics. Heretical books were eagerly sought after, including all Hebrew books, especially the Talmud, and all books printed in Germany, Paris, and Lyons, and immense bonfires were kindled, which were fed with the leaves of the books thus collected. Numbers of persons were apprehended and sent to Rome for trial, of whom not a few perished; and many more would have suffered the same fate had not Cosmo stipulated that, though the accused were to be tried at Rome, the execution of their sentence was to be remitted to the Florentine authorities, who in some instances declined to discharge the task thus assigned to them. Among those to whom no mercy was shown was the subject of this sketch.

The apprehension of Carnesecchi was secured by means of treachery, and under circumstances which cast an indelible blot on the memory of all concerned in the transaction—especially on that of Duke Cosmo. An autograph letter was sent by the Pope to the Duke demanding the surrender of Carnesecchi, and this was brought to him by Tommaso Manriquez, master of the palace, along with a flattering and cajoling epistle from Cardinal Pacecco. When these letters arrived, Carnesecchi was seated at the table of the Duke enjoying his hospitality. The honour of even a savage would, under such circumstances, have secured the guest from apprehension; but Cosmo was restrained by no such feelings. With the utmost coolness, as if transacting a mere matter of ordinary business, he desired Carnesecchi to rise and obey the summons of the Pope. For this violation of the laws of hospitality and decency, Cosmo received a letter of thanks from the Pope, written as soon as the tidings reached Rome. Though they had thus secured their victim, they were in no haste in bringing him to trial. On his arrival at Rome he was cast into the dungeons of the Inquisition, where he remained for nearly fifteen months before he was formally tried. During that period the Florentine ambassador, at the instigation of Cosmo, who was moved thus far to exert himself in favour of his subject and former friend, made frequent expostulations on his behalf, and sought anxiously to obtain information concerning him. But beyond the fact that in spite of the severe usage to which he was subjected, and though twice put to the torture, he adhered firmly to the confession he had made, the ambassador was constrained to inform his master that he could learn nothing satisfactory of the affair of Carnesecchi. At length, in September, 1567, he was brought to trial. An indictment of thirty-four articles was drawn up against him, in which, besides charging him with holding such doctrines as that men are justified by faith alone, that by nature we are inclined to sin, that good works do not merit eternal life, that we ought to trust nothing but the Word of God in in Scripture, that Councils have not always met under the guidance of the Spirit of God, that the sacrifice of the Mass is not propitiatory, &c., his guilt is made to culminate in that he thought it not wrong to read heretical books and "that from 1543 to 1559 he had believed that, Christ being the only mediator, it is useless to pray to saints." The trial lasted for two hours, and terminated in Carnesecchi's being declared an obstinate heretic, deprived, condemned, his property confiscated, degraded, expelled, and surrendered to the Governor of Rome to be dealt with as he should see meet. This sentence was signed by four Cardinal Inquisitors.

The Florentine ambassador heard that Carnesecchi, when he went after the trial to be degraded—that is, deprived of his ecclesiastical status, uttered "un monte di vanità e leggeresse," a mass of vanities and levities; but what were so reported to the ambassador we may well believe were the sufferer's bold avowal that he counted such degradation of small account, and held all the sufferings to which he was doomed as not for a moment to be weighed against that far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory which he anticipated was in store for him through the grace of Jesus Christ his Lord.* Being reduced to the condition of a layman by this process of degradation, the skin having been scraped off those parts of his person on which the consecrating oil had been dropped when he was ordained, he was given over to the civil power to be put to death. For some reason a delay of ten days took place before the execution of the sentence; but at length, on the 1st of October, 1567, Carnesecchi was called to seal his testimony with his blood. According to one account he was beheaded, and then his body was consumed by fire; according to another he was burnt to death. He met his fate with a decent joyfulness. "He went to execution," says the ambassador, "nicely dressed with a white shirt, a pair of new gloves, and a white handkerchief in his hand," the sanbenito, with its hideous garniture of devils, being substituted for his ordinary external costume. His constancy had been severely tried during his protracted imprisonment, but he had neither retracted a single article of his faith nor betrayed the name of a single friend, though urgently tempted to discover his associates. No particulars have been preserved of the closing scene of his life; but there can be no doubt that he who had borne so undauntedly the sufferings of a severe and protracted imprisonment, and had gone forth to his execution as if he was going to a bridal, remained stedfast to the last, and finished his course with joy.

By the Papal party every vestige of his writings that could be laid hold of was destroyed, so that only his letter to Flaminio has been preserved. His memory was proscribed, and it became even unsafe to mention his name. Muretus had to suppress an ode he had written in his praise, though unwilling, he says, to let it perish; and in relating this to Manutius, he deems it prudent, like Cowper in reference to Whitefield,

> "Under well-sounding Greek
> To hide the name the writer dared not speak."*

Manutius, also, in his edition of the poems of Flaminio, had to omit all those addressed to Carnesecchi, so that only that already cited, preserved by Schelhorn, has survived.

And so the Pope's vengeance against this innocent man was gratified. And Duke Cosmo de' Medici obtained as his reward the coveted honour of wearing the title of Grand Duke. And Pietro Carnesecchi won for himself the martyr's crown, and went in his chariot of fire up into glory. Which of the three remembers with most satisfaction the deed of 1st October, 1567, now?

W. Lindsay Alexander.

* The term "leggeresse," levities, is once before used by the ambassador in reference to Carnesecchi's confession of the truth. Doubtless his informants wished him to believe that such was the character of the martyr's protest against the errors and abuses they were seeking to uphold.

* He calls him ξηροκρεων, from ξηρος dry, Ital. secco, and κρεας: flesh, Ital carne.

CHRISTIAN FINANCE—ST. PAUL'S EXCHEQUER.†

What is commonly known as systematic beneficence is now making itself prominent in all parts of the Church, almost assuming the position of a new Christian science. It has not, however, become as yet so precise and complete in its expression as to preclude us from offering a contribution towards it.

There is, of course, a very large amount of money expended in maintaining the ordinances of religion among ourselves; and a large amount bestowed in public and private charity; and a large amount applied towards the diffusion of the Gospel in other lands: that is to say, the amounts, when presented by themselves, seem very large. But amount is always relative. The question has to be asked—a question which the story of the widow's two mites will not suffer us to blink—Do these large sums bear a satisfactory proportion to the enormous wealth entrusted to our nation? Mr. Gladstone, referring to the Lancashire Famine Fund, said, "In the mere amount of the private subscriptions, I do not know that there is much to boast of. A country with an aggregate income in the three kingdoms of between five and six hundred millions a year, with an income subject to income-tax of between two and three hundred millions a year, ought not to think much of raising a million or two, by subscription, to meet a great and extraordinary distress." Certainly it ought not; these five hundred millions represent a vast power, and suggest a serious responsibility. But if "a million or two" may be so easily raised on an emergency, ought not the same sum, or a larger sum, to be raised every year in response to the great constant wail of the world's spiritual destitution? The fact is, however, that the annual income of all our great Bible and missionary societies together is only three quarters of one million.

But amount, while it is the most obvious, is not the only nor perhaps the chief respect in which improvement is to be wished. Our methods of raising funds for religious and charitable purposes are surely not the best which could be imagined: the operose and expensive machinery, the speech-making, the preaching of sermons specially to get money, the begging from house to house, the sending of salaried advocates from town to town. We readily allow that the clamant wants of men's bodies and souls excuse the use of such means; but thousands, weary and ashamed, are asking whether no more simple, no less questionable, methods can be found.

This leads such as are in earnest to examine the principles on which all Christian giving ought to rest. Here is the root of the matter. The public aspects of Christian Finance are important enough: but this personal understanding of first principles and rules is vital. The teachings of the Word of God regarding the relation in which our use of money stands to the glory of Christ and to our own spiritual welfare, are more full than many think; and the chief hope of permanent improvement lies in the individual understanding being informed about these teachings, in the individual conscience and heart being quickened into a thorough and obedient reception of them. Without this the very best methods that can be set in operation will be empty, cold, lifeless, and, worst of all, delusive things.

We crave attention to the passages cited in the foot-note to the title of this paper.

I.

The gracious example and will of Him who hath "redeemed us not with corruptible things, as silver and gold," may be gathered from the first. "Then said Jesus unto" Judas Iscariot, "That thou doest, do quickly. Now no man at the table knew for what intent He spake this unto him. For some of them thought, because Judas had the bag, that Jesus had said unto him, Buy those things that we have need of against the feast; or, that he should give something to the poor." The faithful eleven did not understand our Lord's words; but, like men, they could not refrain from guessing at his meaning. There was, they knew, no occasion to "buy meat," the only use of the contents of the bag hitherto mentioned (John iv. 8): and there were just two other uses which the known habits of the Master allowed them to think probable,—either the treasurer was to expend money for the due support of religious ordinances; or he was to expend money in relieving the poor. "Here," we say, in the words of the venerable Canon of Westminster, Dr. Wordsworth, "is the primitive form of a church-fund." This example covers the entire breadth of the Church's membership, for we know how scantily the bag was filled. And it is a very significant circumstance that, while Jesus was the controller, Judas was selected to administer the funds. The miserable demon of greed had prompted him to pilfer from the bag, to cry "Waste" at Mary's fragrant act of piety, and was now dragging him into the bottomless abyss of despair: but as that was in spite of many faithful warnings, so it was also in spite of this daily lesson in an honest and religious use of money which the Master had been giving him for years. But the main lesson is, that our Lord's outlays of money for religion and charity were habitual and spontaneous. Had such not been the case, the disciples would not have guessed as they did. He did not wait until a priest or Levite, a minister or deacon or collector, should come and solicit something towards keeping up the worship of God: He did not say, nor train his disciples to say, Time enough to think of giving to the poor after their spirit has been sufficiently crushed out of them by misery, and they stand whining and shivering at our doors. He was ready to give before solicitation came: He gave spontaneously, without waiting to be solicited. This we venture to lay down as the first grand rule of Christian Finance, a rule inculcated by what is better than precept—the supreme example; and one the adoption of which by individual believers would go far to rectify many existing blemishes—STAND ALWAYS PREPARED FOR GIVING.

This implies two things: but before mentioning these let me illustrate the rule by an example. The late Mrs. Graham of New York (whose Life, entitled "The Power of Faith," was a favourite book with the godly mothers of the last generation), was reduced to great straits in the early days of her widowhood. While trying to support herself, four infant children, and her father by teaching a small school in Paisley, "her breakfast and supper porridge, her dinner potatoes and salt," this lady regularly set apart for God a definite portion of her small receipts, deducting it from every sum that came into her hands before allowing that sum to mingle with what she regarded as her own income. Thus, so long as she had "bread to eat and raiment to put on," she was sure of having something to give, and, best of all, a good conscience about it. Sorely reduced from the comforts of an officer's wife, she did not lose the satisfaction of being always ready, like her Lord, to give freely in proportion as she received.

The case of Bishop Wilson, of Sodor and Man, is similar. Here are two notes from his diary at a time when his income had been raised from 30*l.* to 50*l.* a year :—

"Memorandum.—Easter-day, 1693.—It having pleased God of his mere bounty and goodness to bless me with a temporal income far above my hopes or deserts, and I having given hitherto but one-tenth of my income to the poor,—I do therefore purpose, and I thank God for putting it into my heart, that of all the profits which it shall please God to give me, and which shall become due to me after the 6th of August next (after which time I hope to have paid my small debts) I do purpose to separate the fifth part of all my incomes as I shall receive them, for pious uses, particularly for the poor.—T. W." "August, 1693. —God that gave me a will to make this solemn purpose has given me grace not to repent of it : and He will give me grace to my life's end. Amen. 'Though I give my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.'" *

Such preparation for giving implies that we devote our substance first to God, independently of particular claims. "Render unto God the things which are God's," is the precept which the Son of Man illustrated by his example. And his authority is used to the same effect : "The Lord hath need of it," was the simple reason He assigned when He had occasion to use the property of men. He needs our time and labour and money that He may have a visible house on earth in which to place his Name ; that the travail of his soul may be gathered in ; that the poor whom He has bequeathed to us as the remembrancers of his humiliation may be succoured (Mark xiv. 7). The friends of the Lord Christ, remembering how much they owe to Him and recognising this great "need" as having been graciously created in order to link us and our perishing substance with his glory on earth and in heaven, will devote their money to Him first, and so stand always ready to apply it as occasion arises. Elaborate church machinery, poor-laws, frequent appeals, will not be required to stimulate their liberality,—rather, to create a deceptive semblance of liberality where genuine liberality is not at all.

All this is certainly not new. If anyone professes to state an entirely new principle of giving, we may safely conclude that it is of rather less than no value. The discovery and exhibition of it may be new in the present generation ; but if it is to take hold on the hearts of men it must be at least as old as the New Testament. Our first grand rule—give to God—is as old as Jacob, "I will surely give the tenth unto Thee ;" as old as David, "Of thine own have we given Thee ;" as old as Solomon, "Honour the Lord with thy substance :" and its age is greatly in its favour. But it needs to be taught and urged till it is practised. How many give in the merest routine of habit! How many never once think of giving till asked by their fellow-men !

In order to be as ready to give as our Master's example calls us to be, we must have some definite notion of the amount we ought to give. Otherwise we will err by giving either too little or too much.

But does Scripture determine for us this question of amount ? Scripture at least supplies us with the means of determining it for ourselves,—which is better than determining it for us.

It sets the claims of religion and charity next after those of our necessary support. "Bread to eat and raiment to put on,"—while Israel had these he would regard himself as in a position to give to God. Giving is not to begin only after comforts and luxuries have been secured. All the givings of the poor, chiefly the case of Him who "for our sakes became poor," settle this point conclusively. It is an extreme, certainly, to say that we should give so much as to keep ourselves always poor, for many of God's children have been and are rich, and riches are promised as a blessing ; but it is equally an extreme, and one into which we are much more likely to fall, to postpone giving until we shall have laid up something comfortable for ourselves. The maxim "Charity begins at home," like "Honesty is the best policy," is a maxim of this world, and worthy only of the god of this world. Sir Francis Crossley said, a year ago, "I believe it is quite true that if a man does not begin to give when he begins to get, or thereabouts, he will never begin to give at all." It is no secret to the readers of THE SUNDAY MAGAZINE that this true saying of the worthy baronet represents the experience of two generations, and is to be traced back to the training of a mother rich only in faith and good works. (See Vol. I., p. 278.)

But what of the Tithe ? Let me just say that those display strange ignorance of Scripture who talk of it as a "Jewish thing, now of course abolished." The tithe is no more Jewish than the church membership of infants and the Lord's Day are Jewish. The first to practise tithe-giving, so far as we are informed, was "the father of all them that believe," whether Jews or Gentiles. The fullest example is that of Abraham's grandson : whereas the system of rites properly called Judaism, which alone was done away in Christ, did not come into existence until centuries later (Gal. iii. 17). Whatever weight patriarchal authority is to have with us is all on the side of giving to God a tenth. Besides, the references to tithes in the later books of the Old Testament, chiefly that in the third chapter of Malachi, are such as we should seriously scruple to say have no application to the Church of the New Testament.

But it may still be asked, and we believe is anxiously asked by not a few, How far does the law of a tithe apply to us now ? For one thing, it forms a good unit of sacred calculation, a safe minimum. If compulsory tithes were exacted from the Jews, we, enjoying the freedom of the Gospel, will acknowledge our greater privileges by giving at least as much to meet the vastly greater "need" which God now has for our substance. For another thing, the principle of the tithe seems in its own nature a perpetual one. It served, in patriarchal and Jewish times, as a constant reminder of the giver's dependence, a religious acknowledgment of his living at God's hand. This was surely a privilege: and it is a rule to which there are no exceptions, that the change from the Old Testament to the New did not deprive the people of God of any privilege.

* Since the above was in type we have met with the following very interesting case in the Life of General T. Z. (Stonewall) Jackson, vol. i. p. 102:—"He engaged one day with a Christian friend in a conversation on the Hebrew system of religious oblations, and was much interested in the assertion that, while the tithe was no longer enjoined by express precept on God's people under the new dispensation, the usage of worshipping God with stated offerings of our substance was in no degree abrogated; and that the tenth was probably in most cases a suitable proportion to be self-imposed by Christians for this voluntary thankoffering. After much inquiry and friendly discussion, Jackson closed the conversation. The next day, on meeting his friend, he said that he had convinced him of a duty not hitherto as fully understood as it should have been, and with his usual courtesy thanked him for the benefit thus conferred. Thenceforward he scrupulously gave a tenth of his whole income to charitable uses (until he adopted a greatly enlarged ratio)."

With all this, however, it is to be remembered that the patriarchal practice of tithe-giving was a matter of personal devotion, not of ecclesiastical law: the public exaction of a tenth was purely Jewish and is done away. The New Testament makes giving a thing of personal conscience, not of submission to church law. "Every man, according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, nor of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver." "I speak, not by commandment, but to prove the sincerity of your love." The Holy Spirit guided Paul to rest the matter of giving, not on stern commandment, but on grateful love. The highest form of law is the constraint of a thankful heart: and to those who do not understand this the New Testament simply says nothing. Gratitude and love are to overshadow and beautify the naked form of mere submission. We must have some fixed amount determined upon already in our minds if we are to stand ready for giving at all times; and the tenth, being the only proportion of which Scripture speaks, may be safely taken as our guide, if we remember that the whole matter lies between our own consciences and our Redeemer, whose "eyes are as a flame of fire," not at all between us and our ecclesiastical superiors.

I shall venture to illustrate this by the examples of two who still adorn the church in our land. One whose age and character would render him "very reverend," even though his rank as a Dean did not so dignify him, spoke to the following effect when presiding at a public meeting in Manchester in January last:—"I have preached the Gospel for now fully fifty years, and have endeavoured to practise these principles [those of systematic giving] in my own way. But I don't approve of the tenth being made a rule. If an old man may speak about himself, I would say that I have found great pleasure and comfort in denying myself many things which others in my station are accustomed to, that I might have the more wherewith to help the poor and to promote the cause of our Redeemer; and it has always required a good deal more than the tenth to satisfy me in this."

One who is not much more than thirty years of age yet, but by whom the Lord has already done great things, said, at the close of a sermon, "I knew a lad in Christ once who adopted the principle of giving a tenth to God. When he won a money-prize for an essay on a religious subject, he felt he could not give less than one-fifth of it. He has never since been able to deny himself the pleasure of having a fifth to give. God has wonderfully blessed that lad, and increased his means and his enjoyment of the luxury of luxuries—the luxury of doing good." Mr. Spurgeon, who began thus, is now privileged to control, in behalf of the kingdom of Christ, a sum equal to the income of a peer. "Faithful over a few things, ruler over many things," is a principle which sometimes comes into operation even in the present life. We must begin by understanding and obeying from the heart Solomon's counsel—"Honour the Lord," not thyself nor thy church, but thy God and Redeemer and Judge, "with thy substance, and with the firstfruits," not the leavings, "of all thine increase," not now and then, according to random impulses and under pathetic appeals, but steadily. All will be easy after this.

II.

More definite guidance in carrying out such consecration of our substance to God habitually through life, is furnished by the second text we have cited, that which connects the Lord's Bag with the Lord's Day. "As I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the First Day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come." *

This sacred counsel, full of Divine wisdom and love, has been too long neglected. Mark how many points of instruction it contains.

It makes giving a universal privilege: "Every one of you." Through persistent strength of worldliness in us, we are apt to think a certain rate of income should form a line between those who can and those who cannot give. In doing that we fly in the face of Scripture, blaming the widow whom Jesus praised, and quietly placing at the left hand of the Son of Man those who need not be there but for their poverty! The independent poor feel the proposed exemption an insult, as they well may. Now this rule is precisely adapted to enable those who have least to attain to the highest measure of their ability in giving; only by observing it can they give any considerable amount. On the other hand, it is as wholesome for those who enjoy plenty, saving them from the snare of "trusting in uncertain riches," and helping them to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread." A minister went one day into the house of a recent widow, who supported herself and her aged mother by labouring day and night at a coarse and covetously ill-paid kind of needlework, with the purpose of finding out how she might be helped. As soon as she got a glimpse of his errand, the widow quickly diverted the conversation to foreign missions, and producing half-a-crown, asked him to get it applied in aid of that part of the Lord's work.

* This was not an advice or suggestion, but an "order" (compare chap. ix. 14, where the same word is translated "ordained"). It was given, not to one congregation only, but to "the Churches of Galatia" also, and the inscription of the Epistle is to "all who in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord." No doubt it had reference to one special collection; but I am unable to see how this can be made an objection to the authority of the passage for us without taking away nearly all the authority of the New Testament as a guide to Christian practice. Why are such things made part of the Word of God at all? Still, it would be a grave error to place this text on a level with those precepts which have their witness in the natural conscience of the race, and to press it as an ecclesiastical law. It appeals to the conscience of every enlightened Christian who is willing to be guided by the Word; if any one shrinks from it as a too severe law, he should remember that he is set at liberty (if such be the kind of liberty he wishes) by another text, "God loveth a cheerful giver."

"I came to-day, Mrs. F., thinking you had more need to receive than to give. Is this not too much?" said the minister.

"Though it shud lie by me for aye, I wadna' use that halfcrown, sir. It was devoted to God, and I wad never wish to tak it back."

This took place many years ago; and, though rarely or never administered by the hand of human charity, the widow's "bread has been given her, and her water has been sure."

Private storing is inculcated as a preliminary to giving. "Let every one of you lay by him in store," or "set apart by himself" (παρ' ἑαυτῷ τιθέτω). What we have gathered from the example of the Master, is confirmed by the advice of the Apostle. Let any weary collector imagine the happy change that would be wrought in his or her work, if this rule was generally acted on. To a large extent, the collecting would be anticipated by spontaneous offerings from the privately accumulated store; and for the rest, the collector would be truly a collector and nothing more, not a beggar needing to nerve herself against the humiliation of enduring often cold looks and ungracious words.

But that is not the highest recommendation of this rule. There is a good deal of ostentation about subscription-lists, and something even worse than ostentation about fancy-fairs: this private "laying by" of money for Christ with no eye upon us but his, would bring not only freedom but humility.

Frequency of "laying by" is a prominent feature of the rule. "On the First Day of the week," i.e. of every week (κατὰ μίαν σαββάτων). There is no need at this time of day to prove the power of littles: Penny Savings' Banks, Clothing Clubs, and the like, have done that with demonstration; and all, from the receivers of weekly wages up to the very rich, will find that only by bringing this rule into operation can they earn His approval who said, "She hath done what she could." Were the sacred method adopted, greatly larger sums than are given now with difficulty and grudging, would be given with ease and pleasure. Testimony might be adduced in quantity sufficient to fill much more than our remaining space. The quarterly sheet issued by Mr. Ross, of Hackney—the oldest and best advocate of these principles—is packed full of instances. Let us mention one or two that cannot have got into print, being as yet known only to ourselves. A gentleman in business, who used to give a pound once a year, and did well compared with many—a liberally disposed Christian man—finds now that he can with greater ease give his little boy a shilling every Sabbath to put into the missionary box. Another, a banker, writes: "With a short experience, and a rather imperfect one, I am a convert to the storing system, the magical power of which no one could believe unless he had tried it." This from a banker, is worth half-a-dozen sermons. At a meeting of office-bearers of several churches, a professional gentleman of eminence spoke as follows: "I never made a speech before, but I wish to state, that since my attention has been called to this method, I have become convinced that it is Scriptural. I have adopted it, and I find great pleasure in it." A minister receiving, as most ministers do, a very small stipend, publicly volunteered a similar testimony in our hearing lately, expressing his deep gratitude to God for having been taught a method by which he could give more than he formerly gave, and with no straitness and trouble.

Frequent giving of all we can in small sums, instead of occasional giving of what appear large sums, will save all from a very common form of self-deception. Sixpence is not a large sum, but given once a week it is considerably larger than one pound given once a year. Five pounds looks a most respectable annual subscription, but it is less than two shillings a week; and the Christian giver, hitherto well satisfied with himself, may very properly be invited to look at his subscription in this light, and to ask himself whether he is really doing all he can for his Redeemer.

Conscience is forced to superintend our givings, when Paul's method is adopted: "As God hath prospered him." A man who, every Lord's Day, alone in his closet, sets apart money to be spent for Christ, will not give exactly the same sum year after year, although his income may have been increasing every month. Mrs. Graham was not allowed to remain poor. After she had gone to New York, a sum of 1000*l.* came unexpectedly into her hands. At once 100*l.* was put into the Lord's Bag, without any one knowing the fact until an entry recording it was found in her diary after her death. The fixed habit of giving to God a tenth secured a much larger amount than would otherwise have been given, and saved the giver from ostentation and self-deception.

It is not any day of the week that is to be taken for this consecration, but "The First Day of the week." Divine wisdom and grace are conspicuous here. There is a constant danger in this mammon-worshipping age of our suffering money to secularise religion; but were this rule observed, religion would be more likely to sanctify money. The benefit to the Church and to each believer would be immense. Not while our minds and hands are full of this world's business and care, but when we have put away worldly things and are yielding our hearts to the influence of spiritual truths and of the world to come, are we to sit down and consider what we can lay by us for God. Only thus are our givings likely to be a real "laying up of treasure in heaven." By making the devotement of our money for spiritual ends matter of serious thought every time this holy day returns, we will be in the way of fulfilling our Master's precept: "I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations" (Luke xvi. 9).

If the people of God will thus act, then his ministers will be saved from much irksome and ungenial work that ought never to be laid on them. "No gatherings when I come." Paul has had experience of these forced fitful gatherings, and plainly he dislikes them. Our bad established plan is to lay hands on Paul, Apollos, Barnabas, every eloquent gifted preacher, and to make of him a machine for raising money. But Paul says, guided by the Holy Spirit, "Do it yourselves, rich and poor of you, in your own closets; do it by littles every Lord's Day; do it so as to get the good of doing it, and the fair credit of being faithful 'stewards of the manifold grace of God.' Do not degrade yourselves by needing my appeals to force your liberality, nor me by compelling me to make these appeals." Though our custom has been long established, no doubt Paul is right and we are wrong.

III.

We leave many things unsaid, that we may have space to indicate the happy effects of a general practice of these personal rules on the public aspects of Christian Finance. Only let the members of all our churches, from the man who handles thousands to the boy or girl who is beginning to earn a few shillings a week, be instructed and trained in the simple sacred art of giving first to God; giving a fixed proportion of all; giving frequently; giving under the hallowing influences of the Lord's Day—and most pleasant results will certainly follow.

1. Many offerings for the relief of the poor and for the spread of the Gospel will be made spontaneously which are now got only by craving.

2. The necessity for preaching sermons and sending out collectors will not cease, at least not for a long time; but all about these that is irksome to the individual and degrading to the Christian cause will be removed at once.

3. Free-will offerings, made in the Lord's House on the Lord's Day, will supply all the funds required for the support of public worship, for the relief of the poor under the care of the congregation, and for missions already established. Ever since the days of the Apostles this has been the theory of the Church; but sadly marred in practice by reliance on other ways of raising money, erroneously judged more safe because less frequent and more compulsory.

In Scotland, the plate at the church door is an important source of congregational income; but we are not as yet aware of any congregation which has had knowledge enough and faith enough to cast itself fully on that simple method alone for all its funds. Some, however, are coming hopefully near to this point.

In England, several non-established congregations are mainly supported thus. "We never seem to want money," writes a gentleman connected with a Congregational church in Salop. "We have paid off £3000 in two years. This was by subscription; but for all purposes in connection with our new sanctuary we adopt the weekly offering. Our people fall in with it well, and the amount is gradually increasing. We have no wealthy persons, and were only twenty-four when we started. We have now an overwhelming congregation. I am persuaded that larger congregations would be the result of giving up the rattle of the plate." In Mr. Ross's "Record" (No. 27) there is the following notice of a congregation in Birmingham:—"Weekly offerings are in the place of pew-rents and monthly or quarterly collections, for the expenses of the chapel. There has been each year hitherto a surplus, which has been added to the fund for the liquidation of the debt on the new building. The surplus in 1865 was £132 18*s.* 2*d.* Total for the year, £512 10*s.* 7*d.* Weekly average, £9 13*s.* 7*d.*"

As for the Church of England, very great prominence is given to the offertory by a society called "The National Association for Promoting Freedom of Public Worship." We do not know enough about this society to enable us to form any opinion of its value; but the following sentences from a handbill which was being scattered over Manchester in January of this year, prove that it is, so far at least, diffusing sound principles:—"The system of pew-rents rejects the contributions of the large majority of the people whose weekly earnings would afford an ample resource for weekly contributions, but who are thus trained to the habit of not contributing anything." "It practically limits the contributions of the wealthy or generous Christian to the stated half-yearly pew-rent, contrary to the scriptural command, addressed to rich and poor alike, to give every Sunday as (i.e., in the exact proportion that) God has prospered us." "Weekly offerings are the most scriptural, productive, permanent, and certain means of raising income for church purposes."

The excellent Bishop of Ripon says: "It has for some time past appeared to me, that, for want of a more careful and systematic attempt to secure free will contributions, the amount given for religious objects, whether home or foreign, is far below the proper standard. It is my belief that we want a well-organised system for the collection of small weekly offerings from the less wealthy members of our church."

The following very suggestive table of statistics we take from the report of the Holy Trinity District Church, Birkenhead:—

The incumbent kindly informs us that the givers do not exceed 200, and that there is not a wealthy man among them: yet the second year exceeds the first by a large sum,—more than the half is given in sums of sixpence and under,—and nearly 200*l.* in the smaller silver coins.

We began by quoting words of our greatest living authority in matters of finance: we shall conclude by expressing our thorough concurrence in the testimony given by him to this good movement, and our thankfulness that one so eminent should have given it. "I believe," says Mr. Gladstone, "that the diffusion of the principles and practice of systematic beneficence will prove the moral specific of our age."

A SUMMER HYMN.

THAT we have lived, live now, and know we live,
And see Thy bounties from the heavens come down
With sunlight, moonlight, and the fruitful rain,
We praise Thee, praise Thee, Lord of Light and Life!
Thy mercies come to us unmerciful:
Even 'mid the war of our insurgent blood,
We hear Thy choiring angels sing of peace,
And know that thou Thyself art near us still,
With heaven in both Thy unobtrusive hands
To give Thy children. Mighty is our loss!
Spurning Thy truer spirits, we entertain
The specious forms of sin. Ah, deaf and blind!
Too late we hear the pleading voice of love
Breathe through our shapeless unpellucid dreams
That mystify Thy glorious attributes:
Late, late we find—if haply we do find—
The way of life by which, deep scarr'd, we leave
The gilded paradise of all our woe,
Which to our twisted vision seem'd to be
The dwelling-place of gods. Our present life
Is sadden'd by the deeds of former times.

No vain caprice doth ever move Thy hand
In its good offices. Behold, even now,
Though we are unrepentant, earth is full
Of Thy unmeasur'd mercies. Every field
Smiles with Thy glory; and each chiming voice
In forest, or on heaven's invisible thrones,
Has one soul-soothing song. The sweet wind sings
Soft hallelujahs round the perfect rose;
And each replenish'd stream melodious rolls
Through gleaming uplands to the downward dells.
The season smiles. If nature sings and smiles,
Inspired by genial spirits, shall the soul
Of man do less, when she beyond this sphere
Can look, and see each brighter consequence
Rise radiant, dawn on dawn, like heaven on heaven?
The larger spirit owes the larger debt;
Yet we who come from Thee, and grow to Thee,
Could never pay our everlasting due,
Didst Thou, the Soul of Love, all-merciful,
Fail in Thy tender tenderness to man!

Therefore to Thee, the ever-bountiful
Rememberer, supremely beautiful,
Who hear'st the twitter of the youngling wren
Lodged in its hollow globe of woven down,
In the far forest, secret, deep, and still,
We move our lips uneloquent, and breathe
Hush'd prayers, songs audible to Thee alone,
To whom the silent wish is loud as bells.
Love us, and make us love Thee, evermore
And everywhere, of varying time and place;
Whether the night be o'er us, or the day,
Or the grey twilight of a heart-born grief.
Whatever is, we ever are with Thee,
For Thou dost fill all spaces of the world,
Where the most peaceful planets shine delight,
Or where inhuman war makes human woe.
While yet the flickering curtain of repose
Shuts out the impatient couriers of the dawn,
On Thy world-bearing wing we softly lie
Where all night long, beneath the healing stars,
We slept, while Thou with speed that drown'd the sense
Of speed, didst bear us o'er the populous gulfs
Through glimmering aisles of sweet solemnity
O'er-archèd by the gleaming plumes of peace
To the fresh airs and roses of bright morn.
And when vague sleep is chased by light away,
Thy pure unwrinkled angels hither come,
And with persuasive voices minister
To each diviner sense—entreating us
Out of our baser to our nobler selves,
And thence to Thee, the end.
Open our souls,
That we may see Thy pure prevailing light;
Soften our hearts, that we may feel Thy love;
Temper our minds, that we may think of Thee
Without the slave's dark fear; and make us wise
With Thy eternal wisdom, that we may See, love, and worship Thee, the Only One,
In cold, in hunger, and in wretchedness,
And spurn the pangs that beat us down from Thee,
And bear the cross whereon we may be nail'd,
Patiently onward to the Mount of Christ!

IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.

THE WOMAN WHO WAS A SINNER.

Luke vii. 36—50.

COMING as it does in the narrative of St. Luke (the only evangelist who records it) immediately after that discourse which closed with the invitation, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," how natural the thought that here, in what is told us about the woman who was a sinner, we have one instance—perhaps the first that followed its delivery—of that invitation being accepted of one wearied and heavy laden coming to Jesus, and entering into the promised rest. Multitudes had already come to Him to get their bodily ailments cured: she is the first who comes under the pressure of a purely spiritual impulse—grieving, desiring, hoping, loving, to get all and more than all she seeks.

Jesus has accepted the invitation of a Pharisee, and reclines, leaning upon his left arm, his head towards the table, his unsandalled feet stretched outwards. Through the crowd of guests, and servants, and spectators, a woman well-known in the city for the profligate life she had been leading, glides nearer and nearer, till she stands behind Him. As she stands she weeps. The tears fall thickly upon his feet. She has nothing else to do it with, and so she stoops and wipes the tears away with with her loose dishevelled hair. She gently grasps the feet of Jesus to kiss them, and now she remembers the box she had brought, in hope, perhaps, to find some fitting opportunity of pouring its contents upon his head; but she can make no nearer approach, and so she sheds the precious perfumed ointment on those feet which she had washed with her tears, wiped with the hairs of her head, and covered with the kisses of her lips.

What has brought this woman here? what moves her to act in this way to Jesus? Somewhere, somehow Jesus had recently crossed her path. She had heard his calls to repentance, his offers of forgiveness, his promises of peace and rest. The arrow had entered into her soul. She stood ashamed and confounded. Her iniquities took hold of her so that she was not able to look up, yet deep within her heart new hopes were rising, dimly before her eye new prospects dawning. All the penitence she experienced, all the new desires, expectations, resolutions, that were filling her breast she owed to Him—to the gentle and loving yet resolute and truthful spirit in which Jesus had spoken. She had looked at Him, had listened to Him, had followed Him as He opened those arms of his mercy so widely, and invited all to come to Him. And what He so fully offered—the peace of forgiveness, the blessedness of meekness and lowliness, of poverty of spirit, purity of heart—these are what she now, above all things, desired to have. Believing that she can get them alone from Him, an irresistible attraction draws her to Him. Jewish women were wont to honour, by one or other mark of favour shown, the Rabbi or teacher to whom they felt most attached or indebted. But what shall she render unto One who has already quickened her to a new life of hope and love? She hears of his going to dine with the Pharisee. Too well she knows how this man and his guests will look upon her, what an act of effrontery on her part it will appear for her to obtrude her presence into such a dwelling at such a time. But faith makes her bold, love triumphs over fear. She presses in and on, till at last she finds herself bending over the feet of Jesus, with the costliest thing she has, the alabaster box of ointment, in her hand. As she stands behind that form, as she stoops to embrace those feet, all the thoughtlessness, the recklessness, the unrestrained self-indulgence of by-past years, the ties she had broken, the injuries she had done, the reproaches she had incurred, the sins that she had committed, flash upon her memory. Who is she, that she could come so near and touch so familiarly the pure and the holy Jesus? She cannot meet his eye, she does not press herself upon his notice. But is He not the meek and compassionate, as well as the pure and the holy One? While others had frowned upon her, avoided her, discarded her, treated her as an outcast, had He not shown a deep and tender interest in her, a yearning over her to take her in his hand and lead her back to the paths of purity and peace? It was this kindly treatment that had broken down all power to resist upon her part, which had given Him such a hold of her, which had brought her to the house of the Pharisee to see Him, which had drawn her so close to Him. But the very thought of all the love and pity that He had shown to her and to all sinners open afresh the fountains of grief, and shame, and self-reproach, and the tears of a true and deep repentance flow forth, not the tears of a bare self-condemnation—a stinging remorse goading the spirit to despair. Along with a true sense of her sin there is an apprehension of the Divine mercy—that mercy revealed to her in Jesus. She sorrows not over her sins as one who has no hope: a trust in Christ's readiness and power to pardon and to save her has already entered into her heart. The very sense, however, of his exceeding graciousness quickens the sense of her exceeding sinfulness. The faith and hope to which she has been begotten intensify her penitence, and that penitence intensifies her love; so that as we look upon her—first standing silently weeping, then bending down and bathing those feet with her tears, then clasping and kissing them and pouring the rich ointment over then—she presents herself to our eye as the most striking picture of a loving, humble penitent at the feet of Jesus which the Gospels present.

It was with a very different sentiment from that with which we are disposed to look at her that she was looked at by the Pharisee who presided at the feast. He had noticed her entrance, watched her movements, seen that, though not turning round to speak to her, Jesus was not unconscious of her presence, was permitting her to wash and wipe and anoint his feet. For the woman he has nothing but indignation and contempt. He thinks only of what she had been, not of what she is; and his only wonder as to her is, how she could have presumed to enter here and act as she has been doing. But he wonders, also, at Jesus. He cannot be the prophet that so many take Him to be, or He would have known what kind of woman this was; for He could not have known that and yet allowed Himself to be defiled with her touch. Whatever respect he had been prepared to show to Jesus begins to suffer loss, as he sees Him allowing such familiarities to be practised by such hands. Not that this respect had ever been very spiritual or very profound. The omissions that our Lord notices—notices not so much in the way of complaint as for the purpose of bringing out the contrast between the treatment given by the two—Simon and the woman—would seem rather to imply that he had not been careful to show any particular regard to his guest. Perhaps he thought that he was paying such a compliment to Jesus in inviting Him to his house that he was the less attentive to the courtesies of his reception. It was a rare thing for a man like him—a Pharisee—to do such a thing. Simon, however, was not one of the strict and rigid, the religious devotees of his order; he was more a moralist than a pietist; and seeing much in Jesus to approve, and even admire, he was quite ready to ask Him to his house, in the hope, perhaps, that in the easy freedom of social intercourse he might test the pretensions of this new teacher and see further than others into his true character and claims. One mark or token of his order is deeply stamped upon this Simon—pride,—a pride, it may have been, a little different from that of the Pharisee whom Jesus represents in the parable as praising himself before God for his fasting twice in the week and giving tithes of all that he possessed, yet quite akin to his in comparing himself with and despising others. He, too, might have stood and prayed thus with himself: God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or as this woman here. Anything like contact, concert, familiar intercourse with such a low, abandoned woman, no man who had any proper self-respect, he thinks, could practice or endure. And now that he sees Jesus consenting to be touched and handled by her, his only explanation of it is that He cannot know what kind of woman she is. "Now when the Pharisee which had bidden him saw it, he spake within himself, saying, This man, if he were a prophet, would have known who and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him" (vii. 39).

In thinking and feeling so, he entirely overlooks the change that had taken place—the evidence of which appeared in the very manner of the woman's present conduct, and above all the nature and strength of the tie which that change created between her and Jesus. It was to lift him out of this deep abyss of pride, and if possible to show him how much closer, deeper, tenderer relationship it was in which this penitent stood to Him, than that in which he, Simon, stood, that Jesus stated the case of the two debtors. "And Jesus answering said unto him, Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee. And he saith, Master, say on. There was a certain creditor which had two debtors: the one owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty. And when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both. Tell me therefore, which of them will love him most? Simon answered and said, I suppose that he, to whom he forgave most. And he said unto him, Thou hast rightly judged."

As little as David saw the drift of Nathan's parable of the little ewe lamb, as little did Simon at first perceive the drift of the one now addressed, and so he promptly answers, I suppose that it would be he to whom he forgave most. Out of his own mouth he stands convicted. It would be straining the short parable in this instance spoken by our Lord if we took it as strictly and literally representing the relative positions before God in which Simon and the woman stood, or as intimating that both had been actually forgiven, the one as much more than the other as five hundred exceeds fifty pence. It is not so much the amount actually owed as that known and felt by the debtors to be owing, and their conscious inability to meet in any way the payment, that supplies the groundwork of our Lord's application of the suppositious case. "And he turned to the woman, and said unto Simon, Seest thou this woman? I entered into thine house, thou gavest me no water for my feet: but she hath washed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. Thou gavest me no kiss: but this woman since the time I came in hath not ceased to kiss my feet. My head with oil thou didst not anoint: but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment. Wherefore I say unto thee, Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much: but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little." Thou hast been watching, Simon, all that this woman has been doing, but what is the true explanation of her conduct, the explanation that vindicates at once her conduct to me and my conduct to her? Why is it that she has been showing to me marks of respect, and strong personal attachment contrasting so with those that you have shown, or rather have omitted to show. She has done so, because she loves so much; and she loves so much, because she has been so much forgiven. It is but little compared with her that you feel you owe, but little that you can be forgiven; but little, therefore, that you love. In speaking to him thus, how forbearingly, how leniently did the Lord deal with Simon; how much more leniently and forbearingly we may be apt to think than he had deserved, or than his case warranted. But it was so in every case with our Divine Master, ever seeking the good of those He dealt with—striving by the gentle insinuations of his grace to win his way into their consciences and hearts, rather than by full display of all their guilt or stern denunciation of it. If in this instance he was successful, if Simon's eyes were opened to discern in the two debtors himself and the woman, and in the creditor to whom all their debts were due none other than He who was sitting at his table, what a wonderful revolution in his estimate of Jesus must have taken place; for nothing in this whole narrative strikes so much as the simple, natural, easy, unostentatious manner in which Jesus assumes to himself the position of that Being to whom all spiritual debts are owing and by whom they are forgiven.

"Her sins," said Jesus of the woman to Simon, "which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much." So to interpret this saying of the Saviour as to make the loving the ground of the forgiveness would be to contradict both the letter and spirit of the preceding parable, in which the love is represented as flowing out of the forgiveness, and not the forgiveness as flowing out of the love—Jesus points to the love not as the spring but as the evidence of the forgiveness—to the strength of the one as indicating the extent of the other.

When Christ said so emphatically to the Pharisee, "Simon, I have somewhat to say to thee," the attention of the woman must have been for the moment diverted from her own case, directed to the colloquy that followed, the more so as it seemed at first to have no reference to her. But when He turned, and, looking on her for the first time, said, "Seest thou this woman?" into what a strange tumult of emotion must she have been thrown, all eyes on her—the contrast between her attentions and love to Jesus and those of Simon drawn out in particular after particular by our Lord himself, all closed by her hearing Him declare, "Wherefore I say unto thee, Her sins, which are many, are forgiven." The desire, the hope of pardon, had already dawned upon her heart. She had trusted in the Divine mercy as revealed to her in Jesus, and already experienced the relief and comfort this trust was fitted to impart. Her faith, however, was yet imperfect, her sense, her assurance of forgiveness not relieved from all uncertainty and doubt; but now from the lips of the Lord himself she hears the fact announced that her sins had been forgiven, and, as if that were not enough—as if He would do everything that word of his could do, to seal the assurance on her heart—Jesus turns to her and says "Thy sins are forgiven." Fear takes wings and flies away, doubt can find no more room within, the sins without number of all her bygone life, rush out of sight into the depths of that sea into which Jesus casts them. Not ceasing to be penitent, more penitent than ever, the bowed-down spirit is lifted up as the full blessedness enters and possesses it of one whose transgression is all forgiven, whose sin is altogether covered.

"Thy sins are forgiven thee." Was it in wonder and with an awe like that of men who feel themselves in the presence of One in whom the most peculiar prerogative of the Divinity resided, or was it in hatred and with contempt of Him as an arrogant, presumptuous blasphemer, that those around the table began to say to themselves, "Who is this that forgiveth sins also?" Whatever their state of mind was as to himself, Jesus does not lay it bare, nor stops to expose or correct it. But there was one mistake that they might make as to the forgiveness He had pronounced. They might imagine it to have been capriciously or arbitrarily dispensed; they might fail to trace its connexion with the spiritual condition of her upon whom it was bestowed; if not dissevering it from its source in Him, they might dissociate it from its channel, the faith in Him which she had cherished. Even she herself, after what had been said, might be disposed to attach the forgiveness to the love, rather than the love to the forgiveness, overlooking the common root of both in that faith which brought her to Jesus, and taught her to cast her confidence alone and undividingly on Him. Therefore his last word, as He dismisses her, is, "Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace." In peace she goes, silently as she had entered; not a single word throughout escaping from her lips, her heart too full of humiliation, grief, and shame at first, now too full of joy and gratitude. In peace she goes, light for ever after on her heart the reproach that man might cast upon her—the Christ-given peace the keeper of her mind and heart. She goes to hide herself from our view, her name and all her after-history unknown. The faith and traditions of Western Christendom have indeed identified her with Mary of Magdala, and assigned to her a place among those women who ministered to the Lord of their substance, who were admitted to close and familiar intercourse with Him in Galilee, and who were privileged to be the last attendants on the cross and first visitors of the sepulchre. We will not presume to say how far the former life of the penitent woman would have interfered with her occupying such a position; we will not allude to the difficulty that will occur as you try to imagine what substance she could have had, or whence derived, out of which she could minister to Jesus. Neither shall we dwell upon the fact that out of Mary of Magdala seven devils had been cast, a possession not necessarily implying any former criminality of life, yet apparently quite inconsistent with the kind of life that this woman had been leading. Enough, that when Mary, called Magdalene, is first mentioned, as she is in the opening verses of the next chapter in St. Luke's Gospel, she is introduced as a new person, not amid scenes then, nor at any time thereafter, that in any way connect her with the woman that had been a sinner. It is true that, whilst there is the absence of all evidence in favour of their identification, there is the absence also of evidence sufficient positively to disprove it. In these circumstances it may be grateful to many to trace in the narrative now before us, the earlier history of one so loved, and honoured afterwards by Jesus, as was Mary of Magdala. Much more grateful we own to us is the belief that this penitent, whose broken heart was so fully and tenderly upbound—having got the healing from his gentle loving hands—from that notoriety into which her sin had raised her retired voluntarily into an obscurity so deep that her name and her dwelling-place, and all her after-story, lie hidden from our sight.

I close by reminding you that the forgiveness so graciously conveyed to this nameless penitent is equally needed by all of us, is offered to us all—Christ is as willing to bestow it upon each of us as ever He was to bestow it upon her. The manner of our possession and enjoyment of this gift depends upon the manner in which we deal with the tender of it made to us by Him. We may keep it for ever hanging at a distance out before us, a thing desired or hoped for, now with more and now with less eagerness and expectancy, according to the changing temper of our mind and heart. But we might have, we ought to have, this blessing now in hand as our present full secure peace-giving possession. And not till it thus be ours, not till the hand of faith grasps and holds it as ours in Christ, ours through our oneness with Him in whom we have redemption through his blood, even this very forgiveness of our sins; not till we exchange the vague and general and vacillating hope for the firm yet humble trust which appropriates at once in its full measure this rich benefit of our Lord's life and death for us; not till the comforting sense that our sins have been forgiven visits and cheers our heart, can we love our Saviour as He should be loved, and as He wishes to be loved by us. It is when we know how much it is that we have owed, and how much it is that we have been forgiven, that the bond gets closest that binds us to Him—a complex, ever growing, ever tightening bond, the more that is forgiven ever revealing more that needs forgiveness; with us as with this woman, as with all true believers, the humility, the penitence, the faith, the love, the peace, that all accompany or flow forth from the granted forgiveness, all intensifying each other, all leading us more simply, more entirely, more habitually, more confidingly to Christ, for the mercy to pardon and the grace to help us in every time of need.

WILLIAM HANNA.

"PREACHING TOM."

We had an extraordinary piece of work the other week. The floor of our dining-room had become rotten, and the ceiling threatened to fall down upon us some day without giving notice, so that repair was imperative. It was very inconvenient to have workmen in the house, and especially to myself, for my little library, which looks into the garden, adjoins the dining-room, and a part of the partition near the ceiling had to be taken down. It is true, the underpart of the wall was high enough to hide me from the workpeople, but all the noise and a deal of the dust had free access into my sanctuary.

Unfortunately I had on hand just at that time a work which admitted of no delay, and constant reference to my book-shelves was absolutely necessary, so that there was nothing left for me but to follow the example of good old Archimedes, who, seated in his parlour at Syracuse, quietly drew a mathematical problem in the sand that covered the floor, while the Roman soldiers were engaged in pillaging his house.

I soon got pretty well accustomed to the noise of hammer and saw and plane, but what I never could be quite so indifferent to as I wished was the talk of the workpeople. At intervals there would be a short stoppage of work, and then a conversation would take place between the joiners from below and the plasterers from above. During those periods it was of no use for me to try to put together even so much as a single sentence. I was compelled simply to lay down my pen and wait till their worships in the next room were pleased to resume the hammer or the trowel. Sometimes the thought struck me that I might as well step in and ask whether it was their master's intention to charge me in his bill for the time they thus talked away; but as their talk, though on indifferent topics, was yet by no means improper, I resolved to let it go on, remembering that I, too, often paused in the middle of my work to take a breath and refresh myself. We are very prone to forget that due rest is the nerve of labour, and that the reason why so little is done frequently in a day is because too much is done in an hour. This reminds me of my friend Walter Oakley, Esq., who lives in that splendid villa at the foot of the hill, and has all his life done little else than sign cheques and look over his banker's accounts. One day as he sat in his garden he happened to look at a workman who with a pail was emptying a large tank into a drain. It struck him that the "lazy fellow," as Mr. Oakley termed him in his own mind, was doing the work dreadfully slow, for, by reference to his watch, he found that he poured out only two pails in a minute. Now as my friend Oakley is rather of a hot temper, he walked up to the man and asked him whether he was not ashamed of pouring out only two pails a minute. The man smiled, and said that he could not well do more.

"Well, then, I will show you that more can be done," answered Mr. Oakley with animation; and taking the pail he began working away with such energy, that he poured out about six pails a minute.

"Now, sir," he said, returning the pail triumphantly to the man, "you have learnt a lesson, behave accordingly."

"Please your honour," answered the workman, "would you be kind enough to go on in that way for another couple of minutes?"

"Why?"

"Because I never doubted that six pails might be poured out in one minute, but what I am curious to know is, how long you could continue at that rate?"

My friend Oakley had never thought of that. He was somewhat like the woman in the fable who had a hen that laid a golden egg once every day, and who, to get all the eggs she supposed the animal to contain, took a knife and cut the bird up.

But it is quite true, notwithstanding all this, that if the precious time workpeople waste in talking and loitering were deducted from their bills, we should have our houses much cheaper than they are now-a-days. It is a sad truth, which testifies unfavourably to the morality of the working class of the present day, that there are few among them who seem to feel that to steal a man's time is as much a theft as to steal his purse.

Still there are some good honest fellows who do really perceive and feel this, as I learnt from actual experience when my house was repairing. I was sitting in the library, compelled to listen to the talk that was going on in the dining-room when there was a moment's pause in the work, and I heard one of the workmen say to another:

"Why wasn't you at the —— Gardens, Tom?"

"Because I thought it wasn't right for me to go there," was the reply.

"Pshaw! Is there anything wrong in going out with decent company to spend a few hours in a fine summer evening in a garden?"

"I won't go quite so far as to say that; but what may be right for one man may be wrong for another, and I thought it was not right for me."

"Not for you! What in the world can there be wrong in it for you? You are unmarried, have neither chick nor child, plenty of money, plenty of time, and nobody at home to keep you back. Now tell us your reason. I wonder what it is. Listen, ladies and gentlemen!"

"I will tell you with all my heart some other time," said Tom, "but not now."

"Why not now?"

"Because this is not a time for talk, but for work."

"Hear the parson again!" said one of the band, bursting into laughter.

The tools were taken up again and the noise recommenced with its deafening ring. I returned to my books and soon forgot all about the conversation. After about an hour's time there was another pause, and I heard the workmen preparing to go to their dinner. This promised me the pleasure of an hour's perfect quiet; but in this instance I was wrong in my expectations. It appeared that two of the men, Tom and David, stayed to take their dinner at the job. David, I found, was the name of the man who had begun the above-mentioned conversation with Tom.

"Now you will tell me why you wasn't out last night, won't you?" said David.

"I will. First, then, it costs me too much money."

"But it cannot cost you more than it costs me," said David; "and you earn the same wages as I do."

"Well, you are perfectly at liberty to spend your money as you think proper, but I thought I should not be justified in spending such a pretty bit of mine for such a purpose."

"I cannot see why you should not," said David. "We need a little recreation sometimes. It is as necessary for our health as our meat and drink, and paying a shilling for it is perhaps paying half-a-crown less to the doctor."

"I admit," said Tom, "that recreation is a good thing, and you know that I myself was in the gardens a month ago. But I cannot afford to go so often as you do, and I must seek my recreation in some cheaper way. I often take a walk across the fields, or visit a friend, or read a book."

"Of course all that is very cheap," said David, in a sarcastic tone.

"Why, yes, it is," Tom replied. "But it seems as if you cannot enjoy yourself unless it costs you money. I doubt whether you ever take a walk without calling at some public-house, or have friends at nome without sending out your daughter with a pewter-pot. I see her often crossing the street holding something under her apron. Now I don't mean to say that you are given to drinking, but I sometimes cannot help saying to myself, I wonder how David can pay for it all. I couldn't, I'm sure."

"But why couldn't you?" asked David rather crossly. "I have to support a wife and four children, and you have nobody to care for."

"I beg your pardon," said Tom. "I have more people to care for than you have. A bachelor is the head of a numerous family. The whole neighbourhood come down upon him because people think he can easily afford it."

"Oh, by-the-by," said David, "is it true what I heard the other day, that you bought a set of clothes for Bob Wilkins' boy, to get him apprenticed to the plumber?"

"Why, you know the father is a poor fellow, out of employment owing to ill health, and the boy was running idle about the street all day. I asked him why he did not try to learn a trade, and he said he had no clothes, else the plumber would have taken him. Now what was I to do? I thought, suppose I were married, and Bob were my son, shouldn't I buy a coat for him?"

"You're a queer chap, Tom," said David. "Of course it is clear that if you went on in that way you couldn't afford to go to the gardens, though you had all the money in the Bank of England."

"I'm glad I haven't got that," replied Tom. "It would bring a fearful responsibility."

"Responsibility or no, I wish I had only so much as a hundredth part of it," said David.

"Why, I won't say I don't wish it either," said Tom. "We all of us wish to be rich. That's human nature. But many of our wishes are unwise, and that is one of them, at least, so far as I can judge for myself. I find that it gives me plenty of trouble to spend my thirty shillings a-week properly. What would it be if I had to answer for the use I made of say thirty pounds a-week?"

"If you had to answer?" asked David. "What do you mean? Nobody has to answer for the way they spend their money. Isn't it their own property?"

"Well, I don't know. I rather think not."

"What! do you mean to say my wages, which I have earned with my own hands, are not my property?" cried David. "Have I not the right to do with them just what I please?"

"Of course you have, but one day you will have to give an account of what pleased you. It is true, you earn your wages with your own hands, but who gave you the hands to earn them with."

"Ah well, of course, I don't wish to say anything against that."

"I look upon my wages as money which is entrusted to me by God that I may use it for good objects," replied Tom. "It isn't my property, nor am I myself my own. We are, with all we have, the property of Christ. We are honestly bought and paid for, you know."

Footsteps were now heard, and soon the noise of the workpeople, who had returned from their meals, put an end to this conversation. I could not, however, help feeling interested in Tom; and as I was well acquainted with Mr. Brixton, the builder in whose service he was, I called upon him the next day to obtain some further information about Tom.

"Ay, Tom Perkins!" said Mr. Brixton, with a smile. "He is a singular character. We all know him by the name of 'Preaching Tom.' He is a little methodistical, you know; but for all that he is an uncommon good fellow. He has been in my service these eight years, and I never had a better man either as to work or conduct."

"Does he preach on Sundays?" I asked, thinking that perhaps he might be a local preacher.

"I don't think he does. At least, I never heard of it. His comrades call him 'Preaching Tom,' not because he really preaches, but because he is always giving them some little bit of moral advice. They don't take it amiss though, for he is never harsh. He sometimes gives them rather hard nuts to crack, however. I shall give you an instance. One of my men, of the name of Lewis Harding, abandoned his wife, and was living with another woman, whose husband was at sea. Tom and Lewis, and a few other workpeople, were at a job in the High Street. Owing to the road having been repaired, there was a heap of stones lying close to the entrance of the place, which the road-men seemed to have forgotten to take away. At all events, the stones were there, and nobody knew why. Now Harding, who happened to be short-sighted, sometimes when in a hurry stumbled on them, and once he hurt himself so much that his elbow bled profusely. Tom, who was near at hand, at once fetched a basin of water, washed the wound, and bandaged it with his handkerchief.

"'Confound those stones!' said Lewis.

"'Hush!' said Tom. 'You may be thankful you have come off so cheaply. If you had lived in Israel under the law of Moses, they would have killed you long since.'

"'Who would have killed me?' asked Lewis.

"'The stones.'

"'Me?'

"'Yes, you. Don't you know that the law of Moses commanded an adulterer to be stoned till he was dead?'

"This observation of Tom's made such an impression upon Lewis that from that moment he never saw the stones without being reminded of the evil of his life. At least, so Lewis told me himself afterwards. 'At last,' he said, 'it was to me as if the whole lot of them threatened to rise and strike me; and they seemed to haunt me so fearfully, that I returned to my wife to get rid of them.'"

"And do Lewis and his wife live in peace now?" asked I.

"I don't know. I think they do, though she is said to be a very ill-tempered woman, with whom it is rather difficult for a man to live. But if you want to know something more about them, the best thing you can do is to go to Mrs. Burwood, who lives in the same street in which Tom lives. She is an acquaintance of ours, and a good old woman. She will also tell you all you want to know about Tom and his doings."

Having taken down Mrs. Burwood's address, I went to the place and luckily found her in. She was a cheerful old woman, whose open, honest face inspired confidence and respect. As she was by nature talkative, I had little trouble in getting her to tell me all about Tom, who, as I soon learnt, had been her neighbour for several years, and still kept up friendly relations with her. I also found that Mrs. Burwood was a good Christian woman, who, both from her Bible and from experience, had gathered more wisdom than is usually met with among women of her class.

"Oh, Tom is a good child of God," she said. "He is a preacher of the Lord to the Ninevites in this neighbourhood. But he preaches in his own way: not by sermonising or lecturing people, but by occasionally dropping a word in season, that causes people to think and to consider; and by his own conduct he shows them the better way, and tries to bring them to walk in it. I daresay in passing you noticed a little rag and tool shop at the corner of the street. If you were to enter that place, you would learn how blessed to an unhappy family may be a few words of a good man spoken in love. The inmates are the parents and their large family of nine children. The man was a glazier, and used occasionally to work at the same job with Tom. The woman is not a bad person, but rather frivolous, and has not much skill in household matters. She was willing enough to work, but did not know how to do it to a purpose. She had no rule nor order in her labour, and a family so numerous as hers requires a woman who knows what she is about every minute. She was always buried under such mountains of work, that her very spirit was crushed out of her, and in sheer despondency she allowed matters to take their own course. The consequence was, that her house was anything but comfortable—was, indeed, a very Babel of confusion. Add to this the sad circumstance that the eldest boy, a lad of sixteen, was a cripple, who, by aid of his crutches, could move about pretty well in the house, but never even thought of such a thing as apprenticing himself to a trade. As you will readily conceive, the family was continually in distress, as the husband could not possibly make up by industry for what his wife wasted through neglect. Upon finding his house buried in disorder and filth when he went home from his labour, he would sometimes take refuge in places where he could drown his discontent in the contents of the bottle. Now this sad state of things was well known throughout the neighbourhood, and had not escaped Tom's notice, and he often wished he could do something for these unhappy people. But as he was only slightly acquainted with them, he found no opportunity for this. One day, however, he happened to meet James (that was his name) at a job on the fifth storey of a very high warehouse. During a short pause they seated themselves in a window, from which they had a wide view over the houses of this densely-populated district.

"'If we could get the history of all the families who live in these houses written down,' observed Tom, 'what a strange book it would be!'

"'I have no doubt it would,' said James.

"'And what often strikes me,' Tom continued, 'is the thought of the awful sight it will be when all the heads of those families will stand before the great Judge to give an account of the way in which they have behaved to their wives and brought up their children. I am afraid not many of them think of that great responsibility.'

"'Perhaps not,' James replied. 'Many haven't got time to think of it. I for one, at least, am only too glad if so much time is left as to allow me to think how to keep the wolf from the door. I have a large family, you know.'

"'I know you have,' said Tom. 'I suppose your good wife must have a very great deal to do to keep matters right during the day?'

"James smiled rather sarcastically, and soon had read as many pages out of the book of his domestic life as enabled Tom to see where the root of the evil lay.

"'I cordially sympathise with you,' he said to James. 'But permit me to ask you one question: Do you believe that your wife and children were given you by God?'

"'I do.'

"'And do you believe that God can be pleased with the state of things you have described?'

"'Perhaps not,' James answered, doggedly. 'But what can I do?'

"'I think you might try to do something. Your house is far too full for your wife to manage well in it. You should thin the population. Your two eldest daughters, for instance, could you not place them in good places as servants?'

"'I have sometimes thought of that,' James answered; 'but, to tell the truth, I know nobody to send them to; and—they have no clothes.'

"That same evening Tom called upon me, and we soon arranged the matter. I promised to find situations for the girls, and Tom provided them with clothes. Before a month had elapsed, they were in good places.

"Tom was now, of course, introduced into James's family. He saw that four of the children were of such ages that they should have been at school long since.

"'I think,' he said to cripple Dick, 'you might try to earn the money to pay for the schooling of these four.'

"'Me!' cried Dick, laughing loudly. 'You might as well expect me to dance a quadrille.'

"Dick was a very good-natured lad, and was really clever in the head. Though lame, he was sharper than many a one who strutted along like a peacock.

"'I'll tell you how you could do it,' said Tom. 'I happened to need a file and went to old Allen Bowen's rag and tool shop over there at the corner. He told me that he was much in need of an honest fellow who could take care of his shop while he was away on business, for that his servant had run away with the contents of the till. I thought now that that would be something for you.'

"'Ay,' said Dick. 'He would not need to fear my running away with the till, at any rate. He'd soon overtake me.'

"In short, a few days after this Dick found himself behind Allen Bowen's counter at fifteen shillings a week and his dinner free. Every week he faithfully gave up as much as was required to pay for the children's teaching. After the lapse of three years, Allen Bowen, desiring to retire, advised Dick to carry on the business along with his father, who would be able to do the out-door work. Being fond of Dick, he sold him the shop on very moderate and reasonable terms. The family thereupon removed into the corner house, and have been thriving beautifully ever since. Tom's conversation was especially blessed to the heart of the poor cripple, who has never ceased to look upon him as his best friend and the main cause of his improved circumstances. So far as I am able to judge, Dick is a genuine Christian. He keeps the whole household under the discipline of the Gospel, to which James and his wife do not refuse to submit. It is now as much a pleasure to spend an evening in that family as formerly it would have been a punishment."

"Very wonderful," I said.

"Isn't it?" said Mrs. Burwood. "And he does it all so cheerfully, sometimes even in such an amusing way, that one cannot help smiling even while admiring the noble spirit of the man. He seems to sympathise especially with halt, lame, and cripple people. Last year he made out a list of all the poor cripples he could find in the neighbourhood. There were about a dozen of them. He purposed to give them a happy day this summer, and set about collecting among his friends, and when the plan was once known others began to collect for it. Dick gave a sovereign. Then on a beautiful day last month a large cart called early in the morning at the various houses of the cripples. There were plenty of hands to carry them down the stairs and lift them into the cart. It was a day of general merriment. Then the party drove to the —— Gardens, where a large crowd of friends and well-wishers assembled. I believe I am safe in saying that half the population of the neighbourhood ran out to the gardens, notwithstanding that the price of admission was a shilling a-head, which went to the benefit of the cripples. They had a good dinner and tea, and were wheeled about through the gardens all day, every one being eager for the honour of wheeling a cripple for half an hour. You may imagine the wonder and delight of these poor people, when they saw so many happy faces round them, and the springing fountains, and the sports and pastimes of the young people on the lawns. The amount collected at the gate was placed in the hands of a committee as a fund for the benefit of the cripples during the approaching winter."

"Oh," I said, "I see it now; it was that to which Tom alluded when he said to David that he had been at the gardens a month ago. He must be a great favourite with the people of this place."

"Well, he is liked by many, but still, you see, there are some who owe him a grudge. His remarks sometimes fall like good seed into a bad soil, and then they produce thistles which threaten to prick him. There is Mr. Lang, the teacher, for instance, who keeps a school a few yards to the left of the Mechanics' Institution Rooms. He picked a quarrel with Tom, which caused him much annoyance. It came about in this way:—

"One day Mr. Lang sent for Tom to repair a broken desk in his schoolroom. While Tom was working at the desk, Mr. Lang was standing at the window looking into his garden. He saw a boy doing something that greatly displeased him, for he stamped on the floor, and said, 'Hang that boy!'

"'Sir!' said Tom.

"'Never mind,' was the answer.

"'I'm glad of that,' said Tom.

"'Eh? What are you glad of?'

"'Of your not going to hang that boy.'

"Mr. Lang smiled.

"'Why,' he said, turning to Tom, 'he would have deserved it, the good-for-nothing scoundrel. He trampled upon one of my finest flowers.'

"'If every one who deserves to be hanged were hanged, I believe not a living man would be left on the earth,' said Tom.

"'That's strong language,' said Mr. Lang. 'And how can you prove it?'

"'Why, sir, it is quite plain, so far as I can see. We are saved by One, who, in our stead, hung upon a cross, so it follows that we ought to have hung there.'

"'Speak for yourself,' Mr. Lang replied sharply. 'I am not aware I have behaved so badly as to have deserved the gallows.'

"'Nor have I,' said Tom, 'if there be no higher tribunal than that of man. But I believe there is a higher one, and that you as well as myself will one day have to stand before it, and to give account of every word which we have spoken.'

"'Ah, well,' Mr. Lang replied, now dropping his jesting tone and returning to sober earnest, 'I trust matters will not prove so bad as you seem to expect. I always say to the children: Do your duty; give every one what you owe him, fear God, and love your neighbour, and you will be happy both here and hereafter.'

"'That's a good religion for people who always do their duty and never sin,' said Tom, 'but unfortunately I am not one of them. I find that I have often neglected my duty and sinned against God, and so I am in need of a Saviour who died for my sins.'

"'Well, of course, I too have my faults and defects, as every human being has,' Mr. Lang answered; 'but the Almighty will overlook them if we try to do the best we can.'

"'Suppose that is true, sir,' Tom replied, 'still even such a religion would not meet my case, for I find that I seldom or never have done the best I could. I find that every day I am adding to the debt which stands against me in the great book of the eternal Judge, and I see that I shall never be able to pay it off. So I take refuge in a Saviour who paid it for me by his blood. My works, even though they were a thousand times better than they are, will never be sufficient to cover that enormous deficit. I am certain that if I were so reckless as to bring them forward on the great day of judgment, as a make-up for my sins, the anger of God would burn them up, and me along with them.'

"'What a horrible doctrine!' Mr. Lang exclaimed, in an angry tone. 'You make a bloodthirsty tyrant of our gracious Father in heaven.'

"'I cannot see how the title of a blood-thirsty tyrant can be applicable to Him who, to spare our blood, shed his own,' Tom observed calmly. 'I believe even the youngest child in your school will be able to perceive that no man can have greater love than He who has laid down his life for his enemies.'

"'I shall take care never to teach that cruel doctrine to my children,' cried Mr. Lang. 'I will tell them to do their duty. That will make better members of society of them than your fanatic theology can ever do.'"

"Here Tom, on noticing that Mr. Lang was getting angry, held his peace. Mr. Lang paced up and down the schoolroom, muttering many words which Tom, who resumed and went on with his work, could not understand. At length Mr. Lang, turning to him again, said:

"'Are you married?'

"'I am not, sir.'

"'If you had children, would you send them to my school?'

"Tom paused a moment to think.

"'Before answering that question,' he said, 'permit me to put another to you. Look you here, sir, this is a hole of seven inches square, which you want me to fill up with a piece of wood. Suppose you saw me cut off a piece of four inches square and try to fill up the hole with it, would you send your son to me to be taught joinery!'

"'Certainly not,' Mr. Lang answered. 'But what has that to do with my question?'

"'Why, sir, it appears to me that a man who tries to cover his sins by his own works is like a joiner who tries to fill up a seven-inch hole with a four-inch board.'

"Mr. Lang made no reply, and Tom, after having finished his work, departed. Since that day, Mr. Lang has been an enemy to Tom, and has not hesitated to speak of him occasionally to the children in a disparaging way. This has caused Tom to be called by various nicknames among the lower class. He has not, however, been molested by any of them as yet, for I believe a certain instinctive respect keeps them in restraint. They feel that he is better than the best of them."

* * * * *

The opening in the wall of my library is filled up again, the workpeople have left the dining-room, and a perfect quiet reigns in my snug little study. But sometimes still, when I pause for a moment from my work, I look up to the ceiling and wish the opening were there again, provided I could hear through it the voice of "Preaching Tom."

ANDREW WHITGIFT.

EXCELSIOR.

HOW THE RICH MAY BECOME A LITTLE RICHER.

WHILE we have reason to be thankful for the revived and intensified evangelism that pervades the Church of Christ in our day, we have also cause to fear lest our religion should become one-sided, and so lose its power. The jailer's eager question, "What must I do to be saved?" and the Apostle's short, clear answer, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved," constitute together, like a constellation of binary stars in the heavens, a sure, bright light in the direction of safety; and it is well that the eyes of all earnest inquirers in our day are with one accord fastened on it. It is a blessed reaction from the legalism of a preceding generation. This is unquestionably the right side; and yet it is possible to stumble by leaning too hard and too exclusively over to it. Such books as Renan's "Life of Jesus" and "Ecce Homo," though they disquiet the Church, may turn out to be rods permitted in Providence to smite her sharply, and so awaken her to that half of her work which she has, in a measure, been neglecting. Evangelical Christians in England may well listen to the warning of Edmund de Pressensé, who points out, in a review of "Ecce Homo," that such extreme views on the side of the human and the moral in Christianity spring ultimately from extremes on the other side. Now is the time for those who have drunk in most fully the doctrines of Paul, to listen to James when he urges practical duty. We accept our salvation as a redemption divinely wrought for us, and bestowed upon us free; but woe to the deceiver who hopes in this salvation and fails to obey the law of his Lord. It is the life-work of a Christian to forget past attainments in practical duty, and to strain ever forward, ever upward. Not, indeed, What shall I do in order to commend myself to God's favour? but, How shall I most effectually glorify God and do good?

Learn at this time one specific lesson on life, and take it from an Old-Testament example. "Let me go over and take off his head," said Abishai to David, when Shimei cursed the king in his misfortune. "And David said to Abishai, . . . Let him alone, and let him curse; for the Lord hath bidden him." (2 Sam. xvi. 11.)

This footprint on the sands of time has been made by one of the Good Shepherd's flock. The man who left this mark in the wilderness is safe in the New Jerusalem now. It is manifestly the track of a man of God, but we are surprised to meet it here. It seems to lie far out of the way. Yes; far out of the straight way, but not out of the right way. When the pilgrims get home, they will not complain that the road was rough and crooked. When Israel escaped from Egypt, the line of their march, in its first stages, was round about; and the circuit, instead of leading them past the difficulty, led them to it. The flight of the fugitives led them to the sea, at the moment when their pursuers were close on their track. They must march through that flood on foot; but when they emerge on the other side, they will be rid of their pursuers. This great type is repeated in the exodus of each individual pilgrim. Like the Hebrew host, every ransomed man, at some part of his progress, is led to the side of a sea; and like the Hebrew host, although he cries as he enters the avenue, he sings when he emerges on the other side: he confesses that the Lord who hath done all things for him, hath done all things well.

Examine for a little this strange, eccentric bend in the life-course of the king; consider this sharp "crook in the lot" of a saint, that we may not be taken by surprise when we come to the crook in our own.

There were many ups and downs in the life of David the king. A youth of rural plenty and peace was succeeded by a dark stratum, in which sudden prosperity led only to envy and the most cruel persecution. Again emerging from trouble, he had enjoyed a long period of power and prosperity. His throne was established by successful war, and consolidated by industrious peace. All his enemies he had subdued, and all whom he had subdued he had conciliated. Pure worship rose to heaven; peace and plenty overflowed the land.

But trouble was gathering again, as secret and unsuspected as the charging of the thunder-cloud, away on the verge of the horizon, while the sun is still bright overhead; and trouble burst upon David's house and kingdom as suddenly and as terribly as breaks the lightning on the city when the cloud is full. From the bosom of his own family the rebellion rose: when all his enemies were at peace with him, his own son, whom he tenderly loved and perhaps unwisely indulged, lifted up the heel against him.

Although details are not given in the record, it is not difficult to gather that the rebellion of Absalom was substantially a rising of the sensual and earthly element against the godliness which at that time held the ascendant in the government. Absalom, with his beautiful face and long hair and dashing wild ways, was the culminating point through which a whole continent of long-suppressed profligacy broke out against the restraints of religion. Absalom was the leader of a young Israel, who in those days refused to wear the yoke of a God-fearing king, and determined to have free-thinking and free-living too. This is the true conflict of ages. This spirit is as rife and as potent in our day as it was then. At that time, under the theocratic government of Israel, it could not disport itself at all, until it had first violently overthrown the throne. Why does it not produce revolutions still? Simply because we allow it to take its own way. We give it liberty, and it consents to be godless, without being also necessarily revolutionary.

The traitor succeeded in gaining the popular favour, and a great army enrolled under his banner. At his approach the king, his father, taken by surprise and without preparation, was obliged to flee. The aged father left his home, the aged monarch left his capital, and sought safety in exile. Most of the people fell to Absalom's party, and the conspiracy seemed to have been crowned with complete success.

It was then that King David was compelled to taste the bitter cup that is ever presented in this world to fallen greatness. Those who had served through fear, now disowned his authority with insult. False friends of the serpent type, who with lambent lips had flattered the king, attempted now by a twist of their supple bodies to sting the aged outcast to the very heart with their tails. David went up by the ascent of Olivet, and wept as he went up. Advancing in this guise he came to Bahurim, and thence came out a man of the family of the house of Saul, whose name was Shimei, the son of Gera. "He came forth, and cursed still as he came." "And thus said Shimei when he cursed, Come out, come out, thou bloody man, and thou man of Belial."

This was hard to bear: hard for a king to bear. The adversary roughly rubbed a wound that was still open. In the bitter enmity of this rude man the king would feel the ingratitude of a nation. As the point of the weapon pierced his spirit, he bitterly felt that a whole nation in revolt were the shaft behind that directed it and sent it home. The consciousness that he had in the main employed his power for the benefit of the people would still more embitter his spirit at the moment of its greatest agony.

For thirty-three years had this man been accustomed to command; his word was law; obsequious attendants vied with each other who should best interpret his unspoken desires, and who should be first to fulfil them: and now the moment that adversity comes, one of those very flatterers hangs on the flanks of the venerable fugitive, tracks his path, and spurts his filthy venom in his master's face.

With a loyal intent, and in a rough-and-ready soldierly way, Abishai, the general in immediate attendance, proposed to go over and take off the head of that dead dog, who dared to curse the king. There was doubtless a precipitous dell between Shimei and David when this cursing took place, sufficiently narrow to permit his voice to be heard across the chasm, but sufficiently deep to render escape easy before any detachment could scramble across. Modern implements and methods would have made short work with Shimei, across his protecting glen. Alas! modern methods, which take all romance away from war and destroy human life by hundreds at a blow, have not yet banished war from the earth. No: increase of destructive force is a game at which both belligerents can play; and, therefore, it cannot bring in the reign of peace. War will not die of mere greatness; it must be killed at last by Christian love.

These are the circumstances from which the lesson springs, now for the lesson: having penetrated and divided the shell, we shall endeavour to feed upon the kernel. Consider the manner in which David met this affliction, and what use he made of it. The bearing of the exiled monarch under the curses of Shimei contains a precious example. It is full of instruction and reproof. We are not obliged—we are not permitted to suppose that David, as a king, counted Shimei innocent, or was indifferent to his guilt. As a judge he would have condemned the coward criminal; but at present he is not king; he is not judge. He is a helpless old man fleeing for his life. He does not at present concern himself with the guilt of his adversary; he is all occupied about how he may best profit by the affliction that has overtaken himself. The thought in David's heart is not, How shall I stop these curses? but, How shall I receive them so that they shall be turned into blessings for me? His thought was not of vengeance against an enemy; but of discipline for himself.

Nor does the weakness of the king detract from the value of his meekness. It is quite true that he had not much power at that time to punish his opponents; but it was not on that account more easy to forgive and bear. Feebleness does not make the feeble meek; those have often chafed the most under wrongs who lack the power to take vengeance. The spirit may be wrought into rage by undeserved insult, although the palsied arm may not be able to strike an avenging blow. Not that this man was always righteous and meek. When left to himself, he fell on slippery places, and greatly offended both God and man; but though he fell through his own waywardness, he was never permitted to fall away. I suppose Satan tried as hard to get this man as he tried to get Peter, in order to sift him as wheat; but a Redeemer unseen prayed for him that his faith should not fail; and sent trials tempered so as to test and strengthen his faith, but not to sever its links and permit him to drift away.

In this case he so received the trial that it did not injure him: more than that, he so met it that it did him good. "Let him alone, and let him curse!" Why? Surely it was not a pleasant thing to be subjected to obloquy from that vile tongue? Surely it would have been just to have silenced the reviler! The cursing was not pleasant; it was bitter; but the poor sufferer, while he tasted its bitterness, knew the ailments of his spirit, and felt that the bitter draught was a precious medicine. "The Lord hath bidden him." This was his way of acknowledging that the suffering was sovereignly appointed for him, and appointed in love. Don't rush with drawn sword upon Shimei; he is only the rod wherewith my Father in heaven is chastening me for my good! Abishai's hand is stretched out to dash the cup from David's lips, because it is bitter; but David stays his hand, and patiently drinks it, because it is mixed by his Father in heaven for the health of his soul.

You are sailing over seas that you have never crossed before, but you have the advantage of charts and journals which mark the experience of former navigators on these waters. Those who went before you found a calm sea and a favouring wind, up to a certain point of the voyage; but they have left it written that from this point onward a heavy gale from the south lay upon their side, and greatly distressed them for many days. You have reached this region, and the same gale from the same quarter springs up on you. Your deck is washed by the water, and your whole hull is made to shiver and thrill by the wind. There is much sickly tossing; yet you do not wish it were calm. For you have consulted the journal and charts of your predecessors, and have found a remarkable entry at the close. Before the gale sprang up from the south, they had sailed for some days in a great ocean current that set in from the north. Although in it, and affected by it, they did not perceive it: it was carrying them out of their course, and yet they did not suspect its existence. Afterwards, when they were saved, they discovered that they owed their safety to the storm. Had they been left another day under the power of the silent unsuspected current, they would have been driven to their doom; but the gale from the opposite direction, though it interrupted their comfort, yet saved their lives.

Knowing by this testimony that you are in the latitude where the ocean current is carrying you silently but mightily to your death, you do not complain when a storm arises from the opposite quarter of the heavens. That storm you welcome as an angel sent to save. The winds are his messengers.

Thus David welcomed Shimei's curse, as the sharp stinging culminating point of the great rebellion. He had sailed long on a deep smooth tide of prosperity; but in the tide of prosperity there are unsuspected, dangerous, deadly currents. The sharp blast of adversity is sent by God to save from going down to the pit.

'Tis time now to turn the weapon round and point it directly to our own breasts. The story of Shimei and his cursing is like Nathan's story of the ewe lamb. We have become interested in the ancient picture, distinct in its outline and fresh in its colouring, as if it had been drawn yesterday; let us now take up and apply for our profit Nathan's parable, "Thou art the man."

Sudden angry gusts spring up and beat on our sides as we plod along the voyage of life: do we receive them skilfully, so that they not only pass without doing us harm, but work together for our good? "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is" (is intended and sent by God) "to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you." (1 Pet. iv. 12.) The specific dart which was at this time launched against the king was the foul tongue of a false ungenerous reviler. This is a fiery dart: and, alas! it is not, like the arrows of those days, an antiquated and obsolete weapon. These poisoned shafts fly thick through the air in our own favoured land. The Scripture says, all men have not faith; and we may safely add another note on the same key: all men have not charity.

Calumny is a barbed poisonous arrow, and it is always aimed at a tender place. A good name is better than great riches. It is a precious possession, and may be enjoyed equally by rich and poor. We all love it dearly, and cherish it fondly; when it is wrenched away by unrighteous violence, the calamity is greater than tongue can tell, or human courage endure. Calumny is devilish as regards the calumniator, and it is a very sore calamity in the experience of the calumniated. The blow is easily inflicted. It is not more difficult to throw vile words against a neighbour's character than to throw mud on his person as he passes. In modern times men may and do calumniate at less risk than in ancient. Shimei, although he took what he considered the safe side of the glen when he cursed, yet indulged his spleen at some risk of getting Abishai's sword in his flesh. Now-a-days they can stab you in the dark and escape with impunity. Any heartless man who has command of a newspaper may, without danger to himself, plant thorns in his neighbour's pillow that will cause that neighbour many sleepless nights.

The grand question for us, when calumnies are flung at us, is, How shall we receive them so that they may not hurt our spirit—so that what was meant for evil may issue in blessing? It is allowed, it is sometimes peremptorily required, that the injured should step forth and defend his own good name. This side of the question is important; but it sinks into comparative insignificance in presence of the other side—how shall I so bear the injury that, instead of breeding corrupt anger and revenge in the wounded spirit, it may providentially become an opening by which other inbred defilements may be discharged?

An accidental wound inflicted becomes at one time the destroyer and at another time the preserver of life. In one case, either through something poisonous adhering to the weapon, or something morbid in the condition of the patient, the wound generates a disease which ultimately takes life away. In another case a wound accidentally inflicted on a man who is suffering from a dangerous ailment becomes the channel through which the disease is discharged, and the blow which seemed to injure actually saves.

It is thus with wounds that neighbours unwittingly, or enemies of design, may inflict upon our spirits in the battle of life. These wounds, if we are in a spiritually morbid state, may generate fatal disease; but to healthful spirits such strokes may become messengers of peace, by removing the corruption that was troubling and defiling them.

At certain times and in certain circumstances it may be the duty of one who is maligned to repel falsehood and vindicate truth in the world; but all thoughts of vengeance are absolutely forbidden by the law of Christ. "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." This is not only a prohibition, it is also a privileged exemption. From this rough and dangerous work the Son makes his people free. If the flame that shall scorch the nest of hornets must be kindled and fed in my breast, what consolation is it to me that in the end the vermin are consumed, if my vitals are scathed in the process? Render not evil for evil, but contrariwise blessing. When He was reviled, He reviled not again.

When a Christian is unjustly blamed and traduced, he should not occupy himself with an effort to obtain a victory over the traducer: he should reserve his strength for a more needful and more profitable aim,—How shall I preserve myself from being inflamed into sinful passion by that fiery dart? It will profit me nothing to gain a triumph in public over my adversary, if my own heart be defiled by that adversary's tongue, and so unfitted for the presence of my Lord. What is a man profited, although he gain a whole world of pride-engendering applause, if he lose, even in part, the purity and peace of his own soul? When the gun is foul and overcharged, the soldier may bring down his enemy by the bullet, but what will the victory profit him, if himself is killed by the rebound?

When a neighbour assails our good name, our own hearts too readily prompt to vengeance. A son of Zeruiah is ready within us to say, Let me go over and take off his head. But, beware: like David, see rather God's hand permitting the trial to come, and adjust yourself to meet it so that it will press you nearer to your Lord, and keep you closer in his steps.

To go down into the battle-field, and deliver your strokes thick and fast on the adversary's head, that his calumny may be rebutted and your good name preserved, may in some cases be to some extent a duty: in such a case, may God shield the naked head of the feeble soldier in the fight; but in every such case, there is much pain and much danger to the soul's health. It seems altogether impossible for such combustible matter as we are to pass through such a fire without being burned. Avoid it, in the interest of your soul, if you can; and if conscience, as before God, command you to make defence, do it as gently as you can, and have done with it at the earliest possible moment. Flee; look not behind you; enter your closet and shut the door; and throw yourself, all glowing as your spirit will be,—throw yourself into the Saviour's love, as you would plunge into cool calm water, if your garments were in a blaze while you stood upon its brim.

But wherever and whenever duty to God and men does not compel you to contend, be silent; I would even say, lean in your judgment to the side of silence, for old Adam will draw hard in the opposite direction. Abishai will be there, eager to draw the sword; David must be firm in his resolution to sheath it. Alas! many a time David has had to lament when the decision was given on the wrong side. "These men the sons of Zeruiah be too hard for me." Generally the safer method is, "Let him alone, and let him curse; for the Lord hath bidden him." In this case, you are freed altogether from the distracting, irritating conflict. You are permitted to run direct into the presence of God: with spirit grieved indeed, but not ruffled by passion, you are permitted to open all your case to the inspection of your Father in heaven. A sweeter experience human soul cannot taste in the present world. You could almost thank the reviler for his cruelty, because it became the occasion of closer communion with God than you had ever known in a time of prosperity. You have seen a child more than recompensed for the pain of some elder brother's blow, by the deeper plunge that his tears procured for him into his mother's breast.

> "Nearer, my God, to Thee; nearer to Thee!
> E'en though a cross it be that raiseth me,
> Still all my song shall be,
> Nearer, my God, to Thee,—nearer to Thee."

It is not that you go to God to justify yourself and soothe your ruffled pride: it is the opposite. When driven by Shimei's cursing into the presence of God, your first word in the Father's ear is, "Lord, although Shimei's word is false, Thou knowest more evil in me than my enemies suspect." It is not to hide your sins that you run into your closet and shut the door; it is to pour them all out, and get them all forgiven. When you come out again, you come out serene and strong. God is able to keep what you have committed unto Him. As much of your good name as He needs for his kingdom's cause, He will bring forth into the light; and the rest—let it go. The favour of men is fickle, at the least; but in his favour is life, in his presence is fulness of joy for evermore.

Now, of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum. The tongue is an unruly evil, and there are many of these evils in the world. What, then? When a reviling tongue is unjustly let loose against you, shall you unleash another reviling tongue against it? No; that is not profitable—is not safe. When that gust begins to beat fiercely on your side, so hold your helm and trim your sails that it shall mightily help you home. A seaman in the middle of the Atlantic does not waste himself in getting angry with the blast that beats against him, and attempting to strike it as hard as it strikes him. Passionless he marks its direction and its force; bent on one object, he receives it so that it is compelled to help him forward, and when it has pressed him another ship's length nearer the haven, he allows it to hiss past unheeded.

All things are yours, Christian, if you have skill to take possession of your varied wealth, and energy to employ it for your own advantage. "All things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life or death, or things present, or things to come;" or—for in the form of this royal deed of gift it is implied that power is given indefinitely to add to their number—friends and foes, riches and poverty, love and hatred, good words and bad words, kindness and cruelty, blessings and curses; all things are yours, for "ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

WILLIAM ARNOT.

TO RARATONGA AND BACK.

THE little town of South Moulton in pleasant Devonshire counted among its families, at the beginning of this century, a whitesmith named Buzacott, whom God blessed with a Christian wife and many children. He was a member of an Independent Church, which traced its origin to an acquaintance of John Howe's, who, being ejected from the Church of England by the same Act, founded a congregation at the same time. There were never over a hundred persons in it, but it was an earnest, resolute, zealous body, and within a few years furnished seven-and-twenty labourers to the harvest of God. Mrs. Buzacott was a pious woman, in her ways not unlike old Mrs. Wesley. Her children remembered how, when they fled to her from the thunder, she would repeat the hymn,

> "Day of judgment! day of wonders!"— and the habit she had "once during the day, of taking as many of us as she could collect into her bedroom for prayer." It was in this home that her son Aaron grew up, and from it he went to the village school, and then, being weakly, to a farmer, with whom he lived till his health was established, when he betook himself to his father's business. He joined the membership of the church at seventeen, devoted himself to the Sunday-school, and after some years would take alternate Sundays with the home missionary in preaching at six villages round. This more public service brought him into notice, and by arrangement with some who took an interest in him, he entered Hoxton Academy. He continued his mission-work as a student, and pitched upon Somers Town, where he preached in a room "with a mud floor, a window in which every pane of glass was broken, and all the holes stuffed with rags except one, which had an old hat thrust into it." Richard Knill had already singled him out, as he fancied, when pleading for missions in the church at South Moulton, and pointing to the choir with whom he sat, had said, "There is a young man in that gallery who is now saying, Lo, here am I, send me." In his third year at college, another sermon of the same character drove the impression so deep, that with his mother's hearty consent he offered himself to the London Missionary Society, and studied theology for two years at the Mission College. It was, perhaps, an irregular and too hasty education, but it is to be noted that the missionaries of that date were educated, and did not simply, as they have been represented, throw off the apron and put on the gown. There were few collegemen and scholars bred, nor are there many yet, and their gifts and mastery are only slowly and imperfectly won by men of business; but considering the suddenness of the demand and the quality of the supply, the missionary societies acted well, and if scholarship is no doubt always a gain, it could nowhere be dispensed with to so little hurt as where young Buzacott was sent. For the directors appointed him to the South Seas, then the most distant, and romantic, and heroic mission-field in the world, and drawing more immediately on faith, and wisdom, and patience, than on culture.

The journey was itself an adventure, for those far seas were mostly unknown, and they that went brought back strange and awful tales, such as the buccaneers might have told to eager groups on the piers of some Devonshire sea-port two hundred years ago, of lovely islands with rich woods and many fruits and gorgeous flowers, and coral groves beneath the soft clear sea, and climate of perpetual summer; and of savages, hideous and untameable, and that ate human flesh; of wild tempests, and sudden and woeful gaping of the solid earth, and hidden fires that burst through the thin crust of land. Into this new world the missionaries went out with long farewells and brave hearts, and their lives in their hands, by tedious voyaging round stormy capes, and with much mocking of the rough sailors, and sense of separation that in these days of steam and telegraph we are unable to realise.* There were five on board whom a merchant was sending out in a trading-ship at his own cost, and to ensure them attention two hundred and fifty pounds were given by the directors to the captain and his mates—thrown away as it turned out, for as soon as the coasts of England were out of sight, "instead of the preserved meats put on board for their special use, they were served with old salt meat quite capable of taking a polish;" the water "came out of oily casks put on board for ballast: it was a thick fluid, with an offensive odour;" though the cabins let in rain the carpenter was forbidden to stop the leakages, and it was impossible to sleep "until I procured a piece of bamboo from one of the officers, and with this made a shoot, by which the water was drawn off into a large empty meat tin." Westerly gales pursued them and threatened them with wreck. Mr. Buzacott was prostrated with rheumatic fever, Mrs. Buzacott was prostrated by sickness, and off Cape Horn driven to wish that she "was in her father's stable and had some of the water his horses used to drink;" while the crew alternately cursed and abused the passengers. After five months of this miserable voyaging the ship reached Tahiti. "It was a beautiful day," Mr. Buzacott writes, "such as is not uncommon in this sunny clime; the sky and sea were for miles deep purple; the trade winds, gently filling our sails, caused our ship to glide gently along the shore of this romantic isle; the mountains, one of which is 9,000 feet high, were clothed with the richest and most varied verdure, from their bases to their summits. The coral reefs, by which these islands are girt, extend in some parts only a few yards from the shore and at others some miles distant, forming a placid lagoon and safe harbour at many of the settlements. However calm the sea may be there is generally a sufficient swell from the vast Pacific Ocean to cause a silvery fringe of spray to break upon the reef. In the lagoons formed by the reef there is an inexhaustible supply of fish, and a lover of nature can scarcely enjoy a richer treat than to sail on a fine day in order to look down into the water on the beautiful miniature forests of coral below, exhibiting all the colours of the rainbow, with fish of various hues and shapes sporting among the branches and hiding within the caverns. The water is clear as crystal, objects at the depth of ten fathoms may be distinctly seen."

Every description of the South Seas reads like panegyric. Captain Cook writes almost as warmly as Hermann Melville. "An eternal spring," says Malte Brun, "combining with an eternal autumn." The barest peaks have a richer colour than our heather. The mountain sides are clothed with the pale green crown of the tall branchless apape, and the slender, graceful arms of the fir-like toa wave across the whiter foliage of the stately candle-nut; the dark, glossy leaves of the ati fill up the valleys, and throw into relief the magnolia bloom of the mighty huter, beside the pink fringe of whose large white flowers the atai smothers its blossoms of red in feathery sprays of acacia-like foliage: the aoa climbs like a green wall over the cliffs, and plants its standard on the summit; the bread-tree, laden with its golden fruit, hangs its cool shade over the native huts; the rivers are marked by the winding line of haughty chesnuts, and groves of cocoa-nut fringe the shore till their roots and stems are washed by the tide; fragrant flowers hang from stem to stem, and insects and birds in the vivid colours of the tropics flash through the leaves. Fruit grows without tending; the forest yields food; no vipers lurk in the grass, nor wild beasts in the jungle. The heat is never greater than in Europe, and cold is unknown. Clear streams pour down from the hills; clear bays run up from the sea: placid harbours of transparent water are enclosed by reefs of coral, and the long waves of the Pacific break outside in a ceaseless glitter of foam. Yet the thunder crashes with a more awful roar here, and the lightning wears a more sublime terror. Hurricanes shiver the trees, sweep the sea up to the mountains, and wreck an island in a night. Earthquakes growl below the soil, and shake the foundations of the hills; and volcanoes burn with a lurid glare that is seen across a hundred miles of ocean. It is like a fabled land of the poets; "each lovely island is made a sort of fairy land, and spells of enchantment are thrown over its varied scenes." The seed of the aoa was brought by a bird from the moon, where its spreading branches causes the dark spots in the planet's disc. The bread-tree is a father's self-sacrifice: "I will die," he said, "and become food for our son. When you shall hear first a sound like that of a leaf, then of a flower, then of an unripe fruit, and then of a ripe round fruit falling on the ground, know that it is I who am become food for my son." The rain is the weeping of Oro; the rainbow his pathway to earth; the dogs of Hiro raise their rough backs above the sea; the very sharks are the god's horses.

* No vessel touched at Raratonga for three years after Buzacott arrived.

The sense of being in a region so strange and remote was soon heightened to Mr. Buzacott by actual experience. On the east of the island there was a station without a missionary. The chief pressed him to go; "we will be your servants; we will build you a chapel, school-house, and dwelling; we will fence-in a garden; all the bread-fruit and cocoa-nut trees, all the pigs and poultry, shall be yours." It was hard to resist; but Tahiti was not the missionary's place. At last the chief and his people ceased: Mr. Buzacott was to return from Taiarapu to Matavai; his persistent friends manned the boat and took him their own way; and when the plot was detected from shore, and a chief put off to the rescue, they did not give up their object, but declared they would seize his infant, and that the parents would soon follow: nor did they leave for some days, nor when they did were they at all convinced that they had done wrong. It was a curious illustration of the moral confusion that would be found in islands less civilised. They respected the missionary and his message; they presented themselves for his teaching; but they thought it no sin to steal him. Mr. Buzacott had already remained five months waiting for an opportunity to reach his destination in the island of Raratonga; for ships were rare, and Raratonga was out of the way. When he set sail, his old fortune followed him, and westerly winds made the journey of a week into four. "The island presented a most romantic appearance. Range upon range of mountains towered above each other, forming to the eye a gigantic ladder by which Titan might ascend far above the clouds and hold intercourse with the immortals; the lowlands revealed cultivated spots amid stately trees and forests. The very hills and mountains from base to summit were covered with dense wood of varied growth and colour. Mountain torrents leaped from crag to crag, forming the most lovely cascades and miniature waterfalls, and breathing a grateful coolness through the hot atmosphere. A vegetation of wondrous luxuriance grew down to the sea-shore, and seemed to contend with the ocean for every inch of ground. The battle-field of this bloodless war was a narrow strip of white sand that fringed the whole island. Then came the lagoon with its inexhaustible treasures of fish and coral of diverse hues. While beyond, at varying distances, stood the reef of white coral, girdling the entire island, and protecting the soil from the absolute conquest of the rolling Pacific, whose waves of deepest blue rose on high, always in beauty, and often in majestic grandeur, and curling, broke into white silvery spray on the coral wall, and sent swift wavelets towards the sandy beach."

John Williams was already on the island, locked up there by the same want of shipping that had delayed the new missionary; and the people assembled in great excitement round the landing-place, "a vast host of semi-savages, with long hair and tattooed faces, arms, and legs." The native police cleared a passage, but the crowd was not to be baulked, and when the party reached the mission-house, every room was packed, and through the rough Venetians, "eyes, nothing but eyes, could be seen." At the first native service, where there were thousands present, the scene was as novel, and eyes from every quarter were fixed upon the strangers, "and wide-open mouths, full of pearly teeth; while the long hair, which had never known a comb, gave the wearers a most hideous appearance." "Is there any danger?" Mrs. Buzacott had said to Williams, startled by the aspect of the crowds on the beach. "There is none," he was able to reply; but it was not a reply he could have given four years before. The Raratongans were then notorious cannibals, and a party of those very men had once waylaid a poor man and his seven children, who were flying by night to a place of safety, killed them, baked them in the same oven, and joined in the meal. There were warriors who seldom appeared without human flesh suspended from the shoulder as a badge of honour. When an injury was received that could not be immediately revenged, a mark was tattooed on the throat—so many marks sometimes that the throat was covered—and till revenge was taken, each generation wore the badge; nor could anything obliterate it but the death of some relative of the wrong-doer. One son who had thus received his father's charge fell upon the family, seized them all, with the exception of a daughter, who escaped, put the bodies in the oven, called his relatives, and feasted on them with delight. Their mightiest chief considered human flesh his daintiest meal, and when the provision of the slain and captives failed, would have one of his own people killed. Nay, he had the flesh suspended in joints to the trees round the house, like meat on the hooks of a butcher's shop. Three women, not above forty years of age, when conversing with Williams, at Raiatea, confessed to having murdered twenty-one children, and the Raratongan women must have had the same sin to answer for. Human sacrifices were offered, to propitiate the gods. Licentious rites were practised with a licence that throws the worst of the Egyptian Ghazawee and the impurities of Hinduism into the shade. The tribes were reputed by the Tahitians to be the fiercest savages they had ever known. The first teachers Williams introduced barely escaped with their life. It was a population so hopelessly bad that, at the time, he would have abandoned it; but Papeiha, a native Christian, sprang up, and leaped into the sea, crying, "Whether the savages spare me or kill me, I will land among them; Jehovah is my shield, I am in his hand." Landing among a group of armed men, with only some portions of the Tahitian Bible wrapped in his handkerchief, this intrepid man commenced his work. In part he succeeded. Before two years and a-half the idols were abolished, rough chapels and school-houses were erected, large congregations assembled, and children and adults crowded to be taught. There was the greatest apparent attention to instruction. The men could repeat the whole of a sermon. But there had not been one conversion; the natives were content with civilisation; and regeneration they did not profess to understand. It was at this juncture that Mr. Buzacott arrived. He found Williams, in despair of ever leaving the island, busy in building his famous ship; and as soon as he had got order into his household he appeared, to Williams' delighted surprise, with his sleeves rolled up and a smith's apron on, and was soon forging nails and bolts for the schooner. "For an anvil there was a large block of basalt; and the bellows amused me very much. The poles which worked the pumps were long and heavy pieces of iron-wood. It required thirty men to keep up the blast. These were divided into two parties, the one-half resting while the others were working. Such a machine for raising the wind was never before invented. To make the suckers air-tight, folds of tapu, or native cloth, were wrapped round them; and if the blowers did not so mind their work as to raise the break in regular succession, the blast failed to be continuous, while through the spout live coals would not unfrequently be drawn in and set the bellows on fire." The ship was launched, but owed its first passages to fair weather more than to the shipwrights; yet some repairs preserved the Messenger of Peace for many a service in the cause of Christ. It was work that introduced the new missionary to a new aspect of his life. The South Sea evangelist was to be able, like Paul, to work with his own hands, and minister to his own necessities. The people could not understand wants that they had never felt; nor could he reduce himself to their barbarous simplicity. Involuntarily he became both the herald of the cross and the pioneer of civilisation. "Missionaries had to be their own carpenters, cabinet-makers, and upholsterers." Mr. Buzacott commenced modestly with a footstool, and advanced to a four-post bed; he made chairs, but the wood was green, and they quickly fell to pieces; he planted a field with sugar-cane and boiled the juice into treacle in a saucepan; and salt he obtained from sea-water. The failures were perplexing enough, though only a stimulus to an active and practical mind; and we are not surprised that, before long, the mission-house was well-furnished by his own hand; that the mission families were never without sugar; and that the builder of a four-legged stool became the architect of a church. When there were only a dozen slates for fifteen hundred scholars, he utilised a slatey stone of the island, and converted the spikes of the sea-urchins into pencils; and his own wit sharpened others, for in one place he found that needles had been made out of iron hoops, split, and rounded with a file, and instead of an eye, a notch to which the banana fibre was tied; so rudely sometimes is necessity the mother of invention.

Meanwhile, he was mastering the language and welding it with as much facility as he swung the hammer in Williams' smithy; and the chief was attentive, courteous, and kindly; and Papeiha all that could be wished; and he began to look for fruit. Besides the great natural barrier of an unregenerate heart, there were local hindrances. A chief on whom a deep impression had been made flung himself back into vice when a native teacher seduced his daughter; and the scandal spread its shame through the island.* Ancient warriors who could not break the restraint of law, and men that were touched by discontent, and seventy of the priests "who had vowed a vow over their sacred fire that they would die rather than submit to Immanuel," plotted against the missionaries. "It was no uncommon thing on a windy night to hear the alarm of fire, and on looking out to discover that the house of some native favourable to the new religion was in flames." The chapel and schoolhouse were successively burnt. A guard of hundreds surrounded the missionary quarter to drive away intruders, and yet the conspiracy gathered strength. But it missed its opportunity, and wore its strength out, until a pestilence came and broke it up. A hurricane burst in 1831, terrible beyond anything the missionaries had ever seen. "The ocean seemed to rise bodily and sweep over the lowlands with frightful rapidity," provisions were destroyed, and there came a famine. Rebellion, plague, hurricane, and famine, wrought out their purpose. The natives felt that God was speaking, and that they must hear. They dropped in one by one, confessing hideous sins that they had stoutly denied. Four of them, well-known men, were baptised, and formed the nucleus of the first Christian Church. They "appeared full of love to Christ and love for the souls of their countrymen. Nearly the whole of their time was given cheerfully to the Lord's work. They would go two and three together in some cases, and in others singly. The compulsory summons to the chapel was dropped, and instead of religion being associated with the chief, the people were taught their personal responsibility." The visits of these members were always ended by prayer. "Scarcely a sermon was now preached without a blessing. Penitents came daily, anxiously inquiring, and often by night the missionary would be aroused by some sin-stricken soul unable to wait until the morning; the whole island became a garden of the Lord; and to the present day no spot of the mission field can compare with Raratonga in the variety and abundance of its precious fruit."†

* At Savaii, in the Samoas, Mr. Buzacott mentions the hindrance of runaway sailors, who set up superstitions on their own account. A young fellow assumed the title of Tangipo, the night-crier, erected a rough pulpit in a native hut, and placed upon it some old books he had brought ashore. "These he styled sacred books, which he allowed to be uncovered only on Sundays. In imitation of the Evangelists, he persuaded the people to assemble for worship on the Lord's day. The service consisted on the part of the hearers in coming to the sacred books and listening to some paragraph read by the sailor out of one of the books, which he did not deign to explain to his audience. He managed to be regarded as the high priest of his lotu or religion, and as such was held in high repute, and liberally supported by his disciples." Another, Joe Gimlet, "taught the natives to keep the Sabbath as a day of feasting and worship. His followers met in their places of worship, and went through certain performances which had been practised in their heathen superstitions, and to these he added the firing of muskets, and some absurd and unintelligible references to the name of Jesus Christ."

† The four first Christians to whom so much was owed were afterwards unanimously chosen deacons. Maran, who had murdered the father with his seven children, died full of joy. Tuata died, exhorting an ungodly nephew on whom his words took effect, and who in his turn died as a teacher in New Caledonia. Uriarau, an old warrior,

Some of the instances were striking. "On Thursday morning very early, I found Abera, an old chief, an uncle of Makea's, waiting at the door of my study. It was only about five o'clock, and he said he had been waiting long before daybreak. The sermon I had preached on the evening before had deprived him of sleep. He said it so exactly suited his case that he felt as if I were preaching to him alone. The subject was, Who have fled for refuge. Holding his head down, he directed my attention to a large scar on the back of it, saying it was done by his own brother in their heathenism. Their father had died, and left him a portion of land, at which his eldest brother was very angry; and as he was not willing to give it up, he was determined to kill him. One day, as he was walking alone, a short distance in advance, his brother hurled a large stone at his head, which laid it open. He fell down bleeding, and his brother, supposing him to be dead, dragged the body aside into the bush, and left it. After a while consciousness returned; and, weak as he was, he crawled away, and succeeded in reaching the residence of Makea, and put himself under his protection. Makea, the chief, received him, and defended his rights. Abera said, 'You told me in your sermon last night that I was still in danger—the justice of God was pursuing me on account of my sins, and that unless I fled to the refuge God had provided, I should be overtaken and perish. Like as I was successful in obtaining protection from my own brother, who sought my life, so now I wish to flee to Jesus to be saved from the hands of the avenger.'" Makea was the greatest and bravest man in Rarotonga, and one of the most cruel. "On one occasion he found a thief stealing some trifle from his premises; he seized the thief, bound him to a tree, thrust his spear through his body, and thus nailed him to the tree. He then left the man in this awful situation, and coolly went home to his dinner. After which he returned to his victim, whose agonies were excruciating, and whose cries for mercy were heartrending; but the heart of Makea knew nought of mercy, or even of pity: seizing the end of the spear, he literally dragged the spear to and fro through the poor culprit's body, until death put an end to his torture." He attached himself to the missionaries long before he believed in Christ; and his conversion followed some singular incidents in his life. As chief judge he had sentenced many persons for adultery, when it came out that he himself was guilty. He frankly confessed it, and insisted that the law must be obeyed. As no one at the station would venture to be judge, the chiefs and judges of the other two stations were summoned, "and a large concourse gathered at the gate of the entrance to his own house, the usual place of trial. Tupe, the excellent and upright judge of Ngatangüa, was appointed to pass the sentence. Makea stood up as a culprit, and made a solemn confession of his sins before them all, and Tupe fearlessly passed the sentence on him and his guilty companion, and accompanied the sentence, which consisted of fines, with faithful and cautionary remarks." After a sermon on Zaccheus, the mission-house was beset with persons, some of high rank, restoring tools and other articles they had stolen, and bringing a present of a fowl as interest for the loan. Makea had nothing of this kind to restore, but he had appropriated land of the lesser chiefs; and inviting those he had wronged to a feast, he confessed his sin, and restored to every man his own. In the adult school he sat on the same form with Ma, the sorcerer, Maeau, an old priest, and some ancient warriors, notorious for their savage life; and a little boy might often be seen teaching them the mysteries of reading and writing. He lived long enough after his conversion to prove its reality, and died in peace. It was surely natural when the people said, "Oh, what a wonderful thing is the Gospel!" Nor was the change it wrought confined to a few; nor was it less broad, and marked, and deep, than we might expect.

"Well, my friend," said Mr. Pitman to a very old man who went into his study, "what is your business?"

"I wish to give myself to God in baptism."

"Is that the real desire of your heart?"

"Yes, the real desire."

"Do you love God and Christ?"

"Yes, I love God. I have been a wretched being, a great warrior in this place, and many a one have I slain in my days of ignorance; but there is a new day. We now hear things that we never heard before. I heard you preach from these words, God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. I thought much about the cross of Christ."

"Do you know who is Christ?"

"He is the Son of God."

"What was his object in coming into this world?"

"To be the true sacrifice for sins, that we might be saved."

"Do you pray to Him?"

"Oh, yes."

"Do you trust in Him?"

"Yes, like this," leaning his back and his whole weight against the sofa in the study. "My soul thus leans on Christ."

At a missionary meeting in the island, an old man rose up and said, "I have lived during the reign of four kings. In the first I was but young; we were continually at war, and a fearful season it was—watching and hiding with fear were all our engagements. During the reign of the second we were overtaken with a severe famine, and all expected to perish. Then we ate rats and grass, and this wood and the other wood, and many other unmentionable things. During the third we were conquered, and became the peck and prey of the two other settlements of the island. Then, if a man went to fish he rarely ever returned; or if a woman went any distance to fetch wood, she was rarely ever seen again. But during the reign of the third king, we were visited by another king—a great king, a good king, a powerful king, a king of love,—Jesus the Lord from heaven. He has gained the victory—He has conquered our hearts."

These missionary meetings themselves read curiously within a generation of the time when a missionary ran passed away in a calm, firm trust. And Ma, the sorcerer, to whose gains the Gospel put an end, is still alive at fourscore years, the Christian patriarch of the island.

imminent risk of being eaten. The people meet in the open air, somewhat in the German fashion, for an entire day of missionary festival. They dine after the service, in some quiet spot among the woods, with the leaves of the hibiscus for table-cloth and plates; and after dinner they resume their graver work, "say their little words" on the subject before them, and bring their gifts.* To such a people the Bible was a priceless treasure. It was at first only accessible in manuscript, and to the most was only to be had by memory; but "whole chapters were repeated almost without a single blunder." The first edition of the Bible in print, consisting of 5000 copies, was immediately sold, and the native purchasers thus completely repaid the grant made by the Bible Society. When Makea received it, he exclaimed, "Now am I a great chief." It was the first thing that Tupe tried to save from his burning house; and when, though at the risk of his life, he failed, he piteously moaned, "Oh! teacher, the book of God is consumed; let not my house and property be regarded; but oh! my book, my book!" "Friends," said Mrs. Buzacott, as she passed through the settlement one evening, and found a family sitting in the dark, "how is it that you are sitting in the dark? Have you no oil?" "We have very little," they replied; "so we keep the lamp burning while we read the Scriptures, and then we blow it out and sit in the dark till we sleep." It was in the schools that the main early work of the missionary was done. The attendance was large, for every one was anxious to master the cabalistic signs of the alphabet, and "to make chips talk." Natives often followed the letter-carrier, and put their ear as near as they could in hope of hearing the contents. They would chant over the lessons they had learnt, as if they were so many heathen songs; and repeat the alphabet as a form of prayer.† A thousand adults assembled at sunrise, and fifteen hundred children came an hour and a half later; and as the primary instruction advanced, adult classes were formed, where instruction of a higher kind was imparted, and the fanciful legends on natural phenomena were exchanged for accurate knowledge.‡ When the number of converts increased, a missionary college was established, where evangelists received a suitable training, and a female school was opened by Miss Buzacott for the daughters of the chiefs, and at once became popular. It became a rare thing for a child of eight to be unable to read and write, many of the scholars had attained proficiency in arithmetic, geography, and astronomy; and Sir Edward Belcher was shown "a manuscript copy of the New Testament, the writing clear and intelligible," and the work of one of the pupils. At first there were no school-books, but this want was soon repaired by the indefatigable missionary. He taught himself printing; and while his brother missionaries helped him in translation, he set up, corrected, printed, and bound the sheets. Beginning with no better agency than a worm-eaten press, he printed not less than 100,000 volumes, and most of them prepared by himself. They included the Old and New Testaments, the "Pilgrim's Progress," Watts' books for children, Bogue's "Theological Lectures," and various elementary reading books, that in later editions were illustrated by woodcuts. But the result of these labours may be best estimated by what we know of Mr. Buzacott's station, Avarua, when he left the island in 1857. The original native hut was merely a respectable shed, thatched in with palmetta leaf, provided with an aperture of four feet square for door and windows, and sufficiently large to receive from forty to fifty tenants. At Avarua a broad and level road runs for two miles parallel with the beach, bordered on each side by detached cottages, that, with their bright coral plaster, and Venetian blinds, and pretty gardens, look more like a European than a native settlement. Ornamental plants shade the white coral footpath from each house to the street, which is itself planted with rows of the beautiful Ti tree. Many of the cottages are stone, and are furnished with beds, tables, chairs, sofas, and cupboards. About a quarter of a mile from the road, on a terrace cut away from a steep hill, lies the mission-house, gleaming through an avenue of cocoa-nuts. The mission college is a much larger building, also on ground terraced out of the hill, and built of block coral. Besides school-rooms, lecture-rooms, and residence, it includes a surgery; and close by are the cottages of the married students. Six months' probation is always required, and the course occupies four years. Their wives are trained by the missionary's wife; and the unmarried students live together; though all meet in the common dining-hall, where the women superintend the commissariat week about. The annual cost of a student is £5; and twenty students and their wives can be educated, clothed, and boarded for about £3 a week.* The chief edifice of the settle-

* At a meeting in Vavau, Mr. Pritchard mentions that almost 100*l.* was subscribed; King George contributing ten sovereigns which he had received for the model of a Tonga canoe, that, as the best mechanic in the island, he had good-naturedly built for the captain of a ship-of-war. The same sovereign was on the list of local preachers.

† "An aged couple who resided near the mission-house were greatly alarmed by the evening visits of a cat belonging to the native teacher. The cat's peculiar mew drew their attention to the door of their dwelling, and being pitch dark, they saw what they described as two balls of fire. The wife began to remonstrate with her husband for having anything to do with the new religion; for without her consent, and contrary to her wishes, he had attended the daily instructions. 'See,' said she, 'what your conduct has brought upon us. Here is this monster come from the teacher to visit us. Alas! we shall be destroyed.' Poor puss, hearing the sound of muffled conversation, began to grow frightened, too, and sent forth some of her most terrific cries. 'Oh, Jiaki,' said the wife, 'say some of the prayers you have learned.' Both immediately dropped on their knees, and Jiaki began most earnestly to cry, 'B, a, Ba; b, e, be; b, i, bi; b, o, bo;' whereupon the cat flew home in terror at such unwonted supplications."

‡ Of the legends floating through Raratonga, Mr. Buzacott has preserved the following account of the origin of the sun and moon:—

"One of the goddesses brought forth a son. Two of the gods claimed the paternity of the child, and so equally balanced were their claims, that the child was adjudged to be cut in two, and half given to each. The god who received the head and shoulders for his part, threw it into the sky, and it became the sun. The other god, not knowing what to do with his part, threw it away into the bush. He was soon after visited by the sun-maker, who inquired what he had done with his portion? He said that he had thrown it away. 'Give it to me,' said the sun-maker, and on receiving it, he threw it also into the heavens, and it became the moon. In the horned stage of the moon the children were told by their parents that the horns were the logs of the lad, and when full the dark places were pointed out as the marks of decomposition that had taken place while it lay in the bush."

During a total eclipse, Mr. Buzacott was called out to witness Tangaroa destroying the sun. "The eclipse had just commenced. A small part of the sun's disc appeared gone. 'Look!' said they, 'that is the first bite; and he will not be content till he has swallowed the whole.' The question was put, if the sun had been eaten before by Tangaroa, how did they manage to get it back again? They replied, by giving him so much food as to make him sick, and cause him to vomit back the sun."

* In 1857, 61 of the students were at mission work; 7 superannuated; 36 had died; 4 men, 2 women, and a child had been massacred; 4 widows had returned home; 10 had retired, and 21 had fallen, though many of these last had been restored.

ment is the handsome Gothic church, the third that Mr. Buzacott had planned and built. The massive walls are three feet in thickness, and, like the college, it has been constructed to resist the fury of the storm-wind. A bell, which the natives erected in the western tower, summons the thousand worshippers, to which the Christians have been reduced by depopulation. When Mr. Pritchard entered the school (where there appeared to be about 800) the children had just assembled, and, as their custom is, one of the boys was requested to give out a hymn. "A youth about thirteen or fourteen years of age went into the superintendent's desk, and, with the greatest composure imaginable, read out distinctly a hymn in their own language. They all stood up, and, as with one heart and one voice, sang most sweetly *Hosanna to the Son of David. Only a few years before, the children on that island were running about naked and filthy, indulging in all kinds of vice, and actually eating human flesh." The change in dress is almost as complete as the climate will permit. A native, who had been out a little into the world, declared, on his return, that the people were dressed "the same as in Sydney." Cotton, indigo, and sugar are cultivated; horses, cattle, and farm-yard fowl have been introduced; and the gardens display almost every vegetable and fruit that will freely grow. Thirty years ago a hurricane would have swept away the food of the people, but much of what they at present consume can be "prepared and kept with care." A hundred vessels call in one year. A code of laws is fairly administered through judges and police, who are to be found in every settlement. Congregations no longer assemble at the will of the chief or by military summons, but with as much earnestness as in Europe, and most families worship God twice a day. "On one occasion, no less than 700 communicants assembled round the table of the Lord." And an anecdote, taken at random, will show the sincerity of this Christian life. Amid the weeping which rose at tidings of Williams' death, a native student stood up and said, "Do not delay to send the Gospel to Erromanga. The Word of God must prosper where the blood of his servant has been shed. The seed is already sown." And a hum of Amens followed the appeal.

That is the picture left of Avarua—of a change that was chiefly wrought through the agency of one man, whom the islanders venerated as a father in Christ, and who lived to see an entire race of savages transformed into an earnest, energetic Christian Church. His strength was overtasked, and at length gave way. He had already spent five years in England, but they were spent in hard work, in revising and completing the translation of the Bible. He had found time to sail among the islands, and encourage and help the missionaries. And his unbroken toil had worn him out at last. He determined to leave the work free to a younger and stronger man, and left the island. "Barakoti," said one, "I know what we were in heathenism. These eyes of mine have seen it. No lives were safe. We were like beasts; and when our bodies were slain, they were dragged about the ground and ill-treated; others were cut in pieces whilst alive, and suffered all kinds of cruelties. This was our state when you came amongst us. You taught us better things. Do not leave us. Live and die with us." The people flung themselves at his feet, with tears, that he might change his mind. Resolute in this, as in all else, he quietly continued the preparations for his departure. The population accompanied him to the beach, and stood weeping on the shore; and from the deck of the John Williams the true-hearted missionary took his last look of the happy town he had created, and watched those shores recede that he had first seen with so much wonder thirty years before. He was to have returned to England, but he died last year in Sydney, working to the end, and the last words he spoke were something like his life—Christ is all in all. "Dear friend," wrote Makea to his widow, "the whole of the population have gone into mourning for Barakoti; we are still wearing it; it is universal. All the chapels are in mourning. The pulpit at Avarua is covered with black, and the galleries with white tapu, on which are printed our lamentations for Barakoti." "Barakoti," wrote one of the native pastors, "has left his likeness, so that all Raratonga can look at it." He does not sleep in any vale of pleasant Devonshire; "Raratonga, and the Raratonga Bible, and Rarotongan evangelists are his monument;" but the story of Aaron Buzacott will surely linger by the ancient chapel of South Moulton until some other heart is touched by it to say, *Lord, here am I: send me.

* The singing of these children was to those who knew them as marvellous as anything about them; for although Williams had declared it was impossible to make Raratongans sing, Mr. Buzacott, who seemed to have a knack for everything, made their singing a most attractive part of public worship; and the Raratongan hymn-book went through successive editions, till it included nearly 300 hymns. It is said that, having few opportunities of getting musical instruments from England or Australia, Mr. Buzacott took some natives to the mountains, cut down a suitable tree, took it home, and out of it made a bass viol. A seraphine was afterwards purchased by the natives, and the pleasant chanting of Avarua was famous through the Southern Seas.

* Since the Life of Williams, there has been no picture from the South Sea Missions so vivid as in the Life of Buzacott ("Mission Life in the Islands of the Pacific"). It may be hoped that the demand for a new edition will allow of fuller details, and that they will be better put together.

THROUGH THE MIST.

No sunset closed the dim grey day,
The mist swept upward from the sea
And shrouded all things drearily ;
The light died down without a ray,
And the night mingled with the mist,
And there was darkness ere we wist.

And, as we went upon our way,
We could not see each other's face ;
The homeward path we could not trace,
Though straight before our feet it lay,
It seemed, things loomed so strange and vast,
An unknown land through which we passed.

Still, step by step, we homeward drew,
And though I could not see Thy smile,
Yet beaming down on me the while
Thy tender smile was there I knew,
And in the light of home anon
Into my gladdened heart it shone.

Even so the mists of fear and doubt
Come sweeping upward from the sea
Of fathomless eternity,
Blotting earth's fairest features out,
And deep'ning with their blinding breath
The darkness of the night of death.

Yet, when the awful shadows loom,
When fades the Saviour's face of love,
When from our Father's house above
No home lights lead us through the gloom,
Still, step by step, in faith we fare,
The light we see not still is there.

UNFORGIVING AND UNFORGIVEN.

BY THE EDITOR.

Part II.

Fear not snow-drift driving fast,
Sleet, or hail, or levin blast ;
Soon the shroud shall lap thee fast,
And the sleep be on thee cast
That shall ne'er know waking.

Haste thee, haste thee, to be gone :
Earth flits fast, and time draws on,— Gasp thy gasp, and groan thy groan,
Day is near the breaking.

The cottage, to resume my tale, which I at length reached—and where they who watched a dying bed muttered to each other, "She cannot pass away with that on her mind, it tethers her here"—like others of the same class, was thatched with straw. On each side of the door stood a window, the lower panes of which were filled with wood instead of glass ; an arrangement which an Englishman, who gives an account of his travels in Scotland early in the seventeenth century, mentions as common not only in the best houses of Edinburgh at that period, but in Holyrood Palace itself. These wooden panes indicated something else than Scotch poverty. Hung on hinges, they admitted of being opened ; an arrangement that explains a line in an old popular song, and was well adapted for sanitary purposes. How often have I wished for them when breathing the foul, pestilential air of Edinburgh's Cowgate and Grassmarket tenements!—the loss of light they caused being more than compensated by the free admission they gave to the fresh breath of heaven. The cottage of the woman to whose strange deathbed I had been summoned, consisted of two apartments, called the but and the ben, and a small closet. The first was that in daily use, where the household work was done, the family ate as well as prepared their meals, and also slept, till it grew so large as to overflow into the ben. That, the best-furnished of the two, sometimes boasting a chest of drawers, polished chairs, and an eight-day clock, was commonly reserved for the accommodation of visitors, and for great occasions—festive meetings, baptisms, marriages, and such like. The floor of the but was clay : its fire-place an open one, where the fuel, chiefly peat, or furze, or logs of wood, burned on the hearth-stone, while the smoke, though partly straying into the room, where it hung in dun folds and coated the bare rafters with a black, lustrous varnish, went curling up a chimney so spacious that you could sit with your feet at the fire, and study the stars overhead. These dwellings were simply, perhaps I should say, often meanly furnished. Yet, the abodes of an educated, shrewd, and pious peasantry, there were few of them but had one or two shelves for books, where, besides the Bibles and catechisms of the family, you would find Boston's "Fourfold State," Ambrose's "Looking unto Jesus," Willison's "Sacramental Meditations," a volume or two of John Owen ; and along with them some old ballads, perhaps a cheap geographical dictionary, and a few other books of secular knowledge.

As calculated to increase the interest which, in these days, is felt in the Waldensian Church of Italy, that poorest, smallest, yet oldest true Church in Christendom, I may mention that I was often pleasantly reminded of this feature of the old Scotch peasantry during a visit I lately paid to its mountain homes. Take, for example, a cottage in one of its highest and wildest valleys. It was the home of one of the poor peasant proprietors, and stood near the celebrated rock of the Balsille, where Henri Arnaud, at the head of seven hundred gallant men, defied for six long, weary, wintry months the armies of France and Savoy—against these emissaries of Papal Rome, holding up a banner for the truth, and achieving prodigies of valour. My readers must understand that, though in "Sunny Italy," the inhabitants of these valleys have to face the storms and endure many of the rigours of an Arctic winter; hardships greatly aggravated by their scanty stores both of food and fuel. Wood abounds in their noble forests; but the labour required to cultivate their patches of soil away up among the precipices, and on the steep slopes of the snow-crowned mountains, is such as to leave them little time to lay in a stock of fuel. Hence, half the inhabitants of the parish, where this cottage stood, though proprietors of the lands they cultivate, sleep, and eat, and work for five months of the year in the lower storey of their houses, in company with their cattle, for the sake of the heat they give out. I grieved to see the members of this noble church, the descendants of heroic martyrs, suffering such hardships, steeped to the lips in poverty; but how was my pity changed to astonishment and admiration? In the poor, bare house where I stood, I found a library of not less than thirty books, great and small; and among these, interesting to see and curious to tell, French translations of some of Ryle's tracts and Spurgeon's sermons. The Valdese, by this and many things else, reminded me of the old, poor but virtuous, intelligent, Bible-reading, Sabbath-keeping peasantry of Scotland — many of whom still exist, and whose character in connexion with the subject of their dwellings, I would make a digression to free from ignorant and unmerited aspersions.

It has been fancied and asserted that where people live in such cottages as I have described, and found this woman dying in, the proprieties of life cannot possibly be maintained. Decency, it is said, must always be lost where a whole family live and sleep in one room. So many of our modern sanitarians and philanthropists allege; to use the words of Paul, "understanding neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm." I venture, on the contrary, to affirm from personal observation that many of the old Scotch peasants who lived in such circumstances would compare favourably in point of delicacy and decent habits with people in any rank of life, or any country under the sun. Those who assume that it must have been otherwise, do so through their ignorance of the arrangements that obtained in these cottages, and especially of the merits and mysteries of what are called box-beds. This was an old invention, which no doubt owed its existence to those feelings of delicacy it at once gratified and preserved. These beds, let me explain, were so screened all round with a wooden framework, that when the sliding doors by which they were entered were closed, the party within was completely concealed. Each such bed in the single apartment where the family slept was thus in fact a room within the room, and as much shut out from observation as if it had been a separate chamber in another quarter of the house. Being furnished within with shelves for clothes and other things, the persons inside these wooden walls could dress and undress with as delicate a regard to propriety as the Queen in her palace or a duchess in her dressing-room. And, since our poorer classes find it almost impossible to pay the rent demanded, especially in the large towns, for two or three apartments, and therefore herd together in a way offensive to decency and destructive of virtue, it might be well worth considering whether this old fashion might not be introduced among them with advantage. A simple device, which I saw in use in Brittany, where such beds are common, removes the chief objection to which they stand exposed. In that part of France where the natives, who speak not the French but a Celtic tongue, have preserved unchanged for five hundred years, if not from the days of the Druids, the customs of their ancestors, you will see three or four such beds in one apartment. Made of beautiful walnut or cherry wood, polished like a mirror, and carved with considerable taste, they are ornamental rather than otherwise; and having a breadth of five or six inches of open lattice-work at the top, they are constructed with an eye to fresh air as well as to those delicate proprieties of life, which, being germane to virtue and godliness, Sabbath sermons and Sunday magazines do well to recommend.

To return now to my story. It was in such a bed the woman whom I had been requested to visit lay a-dying. So soon as I entered the cottage her attendants hailed my appearance, expecting that she would now unburden her conscience, and get free to depart; and so drop the curtain on a scene that was one of pain to her, and terror to them. They hastened to announce my arrival. I heard her mutter something in reply, but could neither catch the words, nor see her face. There was no light but what, coming from the fire on the hearth, threw a feeble and ghastly glare over the room, and the forms and faces of her attendants; while, though its doors stood open, the pillow on which her head lay was cast into deep shadow by the fixed framework of the bed. Getting a candle lighted I placed it on a shelf inside, where it shone full on the form and face of what looked much more like a dead than a living body. The countenance was singularly pallid; the nose pinched sharp; the eyes deeply sunk in their sockets; the features firm and rigid; and the brow, from which I put back some grey dishevelled locks, felt chill and clammy. The only sign of life was in the eyes, which, though partially glazed with a film, followed all my movements; strangely, I may say horribly, mingling the features of life and death, giving to the body the appearance of an animated corpse. I did not wonder much, knowing the common superstitions of the country, that those who watched her had got nervous, and possessed with the notion that some dreadful crime lay heavy on her conscience, which she must reveal ere the spirit was allowed to leave its mortal tabernacle. For a few moments I silently contemplated the solemn sight; and on waking from my reverie found the attendants standing close by my side. During those years which I spent so happily as a country minister, I was often annoyed on my visits to the dying by the neighbours, no doubt with the best intentions, pouring into the house—crowding the room. The practice was inconsiderate, depriving of fresh air one who was, perhaps, with heavy lift of chest and shoulders gasping for breath. Besides, it altogether prevented or interfered with free and confidential intercourse—that intercourse which, though far removed from the secrets of a Roman Catholic confessional, often affords relief to the mind of the dying, and to the minister of the gospel a precious opportunity of saving a soul, or soothing a troubled spirit. It might be that the female attendants here in crowding round the bed had no curiosity, but were merely following what, when the minister of a rural parish, I had found to be a very common custom. However, if there was any ground for their suspicions, and some secret crime was to be revealed, it was more likely to be divulged to my ear alone than in their hearing. So I asked them to retire; which they did with some reluctance, taking seats by the fireside. Left alone, I now addressed myself to the dying woman; and, approaching the matter with the utmost delicacy, was not long in finding that she had no murder or any such crime to disclose—a circumstance which, in justice to her, I let the nurses know.

Yet death-beds that have revealed dreadful crimes have been less dreadful than hers. In all my experience as a minister I never stood by one so appalling. I had seen people dying in many and very different frames of mind—some in callous indifference, others in eager anxiety crying, What shall I do to be saved? some despondent, others full of hope; not a few with their heads pillowed on Jesus' bosom, enjoying a calm and blissful peace; one or two, in an ecstacy, in celestial transports, rejoicing in the Lord and soaring away up to glory on the wings of song. Here, this woman was dying in "the blackness of darkness." Standing on the deck, I have seen a drowning man, to whom a life-buoy was thrown across the roaring waters, catch it in his arms, and I have seen a man on his death-bed seize with equal eagerness and cling with as strong a hold to the hope of a Saviour, of a free, full, gracious pardon through the blood of Christ. I made that offer to this dying woman, and, though hanging on the brink of a lost eternity, she rejected it—cast it from her. She was no sceptic; had never read a line of Tom Paine or Voltaire. Nor was her mind diseased, in the proper sense of the term. It is indeed hard to say how dying people may comport themselves when under delirium. I remember the case of a sweet young girl in my country parish, from whose lips, quite unaccustomed to oaths or any improper language, there came rolling forth, as if she had been possessed of a devil, volleys of fearful imprecations. But no fever was disordering this woman's brain. She was coherent, calm, collected. So far as concerned her mental faculties, her sun was setting without a cloud. But what a cloud otherwise rested on her troubled spirit? She neither could nor would entertain a hope of salvation—putting away from her all my offers of a Saviour. I prayed for her; I pleaded with her; but only to get such answers as reminded me of the request of that evil spirit who implored our Lord to let him alone, nor "torment him before his time." Despair had her in his ruthless grasp; and a darkness deeper than what was gathering around her bed, lay on her soul. Still, when I thought how long she had been a-dying, for how many days death had strangely lingered by the door, I hoped it might be for a gracious purpose; and that, called at the eleventh hour, her case might yet prove one where Christ saves at the uttermost. To me, as to his servant of old, God might be saying, "Pray not for her."—"She is joined to her idols, let her alone." Yet I clung to the hope that death had delayed to strike, because, bending in pity over this wretched creature, God in heaven was saying, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim? Mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together. I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger... for I am God, and not man!" So I hoped, continued to hope; waiting, watching, as they that watch for the morning. But, alas! there came no change. At parting, I took her cold hand in mine, and bent over her to ask, If she could cherish a hope? But—as if the pains of the damned had already begun, her only answer was to gnash her teeth, and look up in my face with an expression of despair, which long haunted, and even still sometimes haunts me. She "died, and gave no sign."

If my acquaintance with this unhappy woman had begun, as it ended, there, I might have regarded hers as a case where the repeated rejection of all his gracious offers has provoked God to withdraw his Spirit, and leave sinners, as he left Pharaoh, to the hardness of their own hearts. For though, thanks be to a loving and long-suffering God, these words hold generally true—

> "As long as life its term extends,
> Hope's blest dominion never ends;
> For while the lamp holds on to burn,
> The greatest sinner may return"— cases occur from time to time to prove the extreme danger of continued impenitence and procrastination. Like the lurid clouds which thunder, and flash-out lightnings from the blessed sky, there are, mingled with the gracious words of Scripture, awful and ominous intimations — such as, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man"—such as, "Your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand. . . . For the Lord shall rise up as in Mount Perazim, he shall be wroth as in the valley of Gibeon, that he may do his work, his strange work; and bring to pass his act, his strange act. Now, therefore, be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong,"—such as, "Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all my counsel, and would none of my reproof: I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you." Let none therefore venture to keep Christ waiting at the door—till he come who knocks, not to request, but to demand admittance. When that happens, no Saviour may be nigh, lingering there: nor when the soul, alarmed at the appearance of the King of Terrors, flies to the gate of mercy, may there be any other answer to its cry, Open and let me in, than this, The door is shut!

And who shut it in this case? It was not God. I am sure of that. He has no pleasure in the death of him that dieth; but is willing rather that all should turn and live. Sin is suicidal; and in this, as in every other instance, such as are barred out of heaven, have only themselves to blame. But the peculiarity of this case lay here, that, strange to say it, the means by which this woman destroyed herself, plunged her soul into perdition, was her prayers—and that very prayer which, taught by Jesus to his disciples for a very different purpose, she had learned from a mother's lips, and in the days of sweet childhood had often lisped at a mother's knee. Like, I fear, not a few others, every time, in church or elsewhere, she had repeated the words, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us," she had done worse than drive a nail into her coffin. Judging from that dreadful death-bed, God had taken her at her word. She had lived Unforgiving, and died Unforgiven.

Within the walls of that same cottage she and I had met in other years; and standing on that same floor, I had warned as with a prophet's tongue, had solemnly and affectionately warned, her of the very scene that I had now the pain to witness. It so happened that, years before, I had been asked by her daughter, a highly respectable woman, and her only surviving child, to mediate between her and her mother. Domestic differences about money matters, or something else, had grown and ripened into a bitter quarrel; and, after years of alienation, the daughter, who longed to be restored to a mother's affections, requested me to try if I could heal the breach. For this purpose I waited on the mother; but to find all my efforts coldly, resolutely, and at length even fiercely repelled. As ever happens in such cases, there were faults on both sides. But the mother, not satisfied with admitting none on hers, bitterly exaggerated her daughter's faults, and even where her conduct admitted of a favourable, put none but an unfavourable and the worst construction on it. This shocked me. Still I did not abandon either hope or the attempt—having seen in other cases what a depth of affection is in a mother's heart, and how much more than any one else a father or mother can forgive and forget. I attempted to mollify her—recalling the happy days when her daughter, a sweet infant, hung on her breast; lay nestled in her bosom; the joy of her heart and home, prattled at her knee. I reminded her of the long-suffering and love of God; of Him who shed his blood for his enemies, and, dying, forgave his murderers. With everything that could touch her conscience and wake the mother in her heart, I plied her; imploring her in the name of Christ; and by her hopes of salvation, to act a Christian part, and, pitying a daughter's sorrow, receive her back to her arms. Hard as the rock under whose shadow her cottage stood, she sat obdurate and unmoved. At length patience gave way; and yielding to what I felt to be a holy indignation, I rose to shake the dust from my feet, and warn her, since she refused to forgive, she need not hope to be forgiven in the hour of death and at the day of judgment. Now the hour had come when as she meted to others, it was meted to her again. Unforgiving, so far as man could judge, she was Unforgiven; hers, the only death-bed I have seen, during a ministry of six and thirty years, of blank and black despair. On going out, I found the whole firmament sparkling with stars, and a broad band of silver light cast on the sea by the rising moon, like a path that led from the moaning shore to distant, happier worlds. A contrast, indeed, to the scene I had left!—a dying sinner around whose head a night had gathered without one ray of hope, and for whose departing spirit no bright way seemed to open to the gates of heaven.

Quarrels will arise between the dearest friends, and in the bosom of the most affectionate families. Would that the sun never went down on our wrath! and instead of being allowed to form deep, running sores, that discharge offensive humours, and, even when closed, leave ugly scars behind, would that all such wounds were healed by what surgeons call the "first intention!" But if this has not been done, let us beware of cherishing an unforgiving spirit. Of all states of mind, an implacable temper least becomes those who cannot themselves be saved but by a large measure of forgiveness, and is most unlike, and indeed plainly opposed to, the mind that is in Jesus Christ. It is sad, and much worse than merely sad, to see love turned into hatred, or warm affection into cold indifference. Nursing an unforgiving temper, making no honest and anxious attempt at reconciliation, repelling perhaps the efforts mutual friends make to heal the breach, every time, in church or elsewhere, we repeat the words, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us," we are mocking God; and pronouncing on ourselves the horrible imprecations, familiar to profane and brutal lips, with which I shall not shock my readers nor pollute these pages. Thankless as their office often proves, blessed are the peacemakers! But of all peacemakers, those are most blessed who humble the pride of their own hearts in the dust, and, though the injured, stoop as Jesus stooped, to make the first overtures of reconciliation. Would that the tale I have told might warn some!—inducing them to take staff, or pen, in hand, to heal every unhappy quarrel with friend, or neighbour, or member of their family! Our Lord places such an effort at the head of all Christian duties. He gives it honourable precedence over prayers, and preaching, and sacraments, and the highest religious services. It is one a man should leave his pew in the church, should rise from the sacred table of communion, should get carried from his dying bed, to accomplish. "If," says our Lord, "thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee; leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing." Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. Unforgiving, is to be Unforgiven.

LAZARUS.

THERE were neighbours and friends to welcome the dead man back. The merest spectators could not resist the infection of delight. We think of the vacant places filled up in many hearts; of the happy stop put to the mourning of those four days; of the busy, eager greetings; a joy too bright and absorbed to allow of other thoughts but one. We think of the cry we have uttered after the departed; involuntary, wailing, hopeless cry forced from us by grief or keen memories; and of what we might have felt, had that cry been stilled by their return. Yet an awe overshadowed the joy. It was not a return to life from the verge of death, a reversal of the last sad words of the physician, a recovery from faint or stupor that had worn death's aspect. But the gates of the invisible world had been flung open to let Lazarus pass out, and a word had done it, and He who spoke the word was standing in the midst. Before this Master, who could spoil the kingdom of death and bind the strong man, men would hush the babble and tumult of their gladness. The sisters, above all, must have felt the strangeness of the scene. Covering their eyes from the ghastly sight in the tomb and then lifting them to see their brother alive, clinging to the sympathy of their brother's friend and the tears He wept with them and then face to face with that brother himself, knowing him dead and seeing him living, yearning yet too timid to touch him and clasp him, haunted by the dream that he was but half real, and that he must come back changed and perhaps in future isolated—it was all too sudden to be realised, nor dared they trust themselves to take what God had given, till their joy swept away "all subtle thought, all curious fears," and they led him to the house and could look with hungry love into his eyes. Then the mourners wound their way back to Jerusalem, the burial-place grew silent and deserted, the shadows lay in deep folds among the hills, and in the family of Bethany there was peace, and the Prince of Peace himself was there, and Lazarus, his friend, whom He had raised from the dead.

IV.

Lazarus appears only once again, and that appearance, perfectly simple and natural in itself, manifestly owes its place in the record to the miracle, and not to the personal history of the man. He took his place at a feast when Jesus was afterwards entertained in Bethany, where his sisters were also present. Bethany had already come to be the village where Lazarus lived; Lazarus himself had come to be, he that was dead. It was the miracle that was pointed at, and the man for the miracle's sake. The interest of that supper does not turn on him, but on Mary; there is no record of his words, or of his bearing to Jesus, or of the words of others about him. He had already borne his witness to the human sympathy and divine might of Jesus; for all purposes of illustration his life was at an end; and the next light flung on the character of Christ is from Mary, not from him. But his resurrection was not a mere apparition, a moment's wonder: he was visible, within easy reach. The loud voice had already repelled the insinuation that there was any murmured incantation or wizardry about it; his daily presence would remain as the simplest evidence of what had happened. The veil of mystery that hung over him on his return is lifted up to let us see that he resumed the functions of his life. He returned to be a brother in his home, a neighbour to his townsmen, a friend to Jesus. He ate and drank, he went to men's houses, he took his part in society. That is the last impression of him that we have. There was indeed a young man who was seen at night in Gethsemane hastily roused from some near house, for he had only a linen cloth cast about his body, and who narrowly escaped being made a prisoner. He has been identified with Lazarus. It is not improbable; it is natural even that Lazarus would cling to Jesus at the last; if the identity is assumed, it would explain his apparent absence from the crucifixion.* But as far as any absolute certainty goes, as far as the narrative requires, we take leave of him at the supper where he saw his sister anoint their Saviour's feet. Church legend gives him thirty more years of life, and makes him die at sixty; it sends him and his sisters out in a leaky boat and takes them by miracle to preach the Gospel at Marseilles; it leads him to martyrdom, and fetches his bones to Constantinople and builds over them a church. It is not this exactly that we care to know, even if we could. He had seen death; he had been vanquished and led away by it into whatever is beyond. Men have been brought very near to die and have recovered, when a second or a breath would have turned the scale. They have come back with an awe and reserve that never wore quite away. Men have surrendered themselves to death, calmly faced and expected it, yet have rejoined the living. But none of these cases tell us what it actually is to die. We see strange lights gleaming from dying eyes, sudden starts of happy souls, and flashes of intelligence that beautify the face. We hear words of broken rapture, see the struggle to tell something that is felt for the first time, look wistfully on, and only watch the secret pass away behind the closed lips and the silence of the grave. What is it? What is the pain? What revelation bursts upon the spirit at its release? Lazarus could have told. He kept the wonder in his heart. He had actually been in the world of shadows. He could declare what the grave is like. When he resumed his place, the mark of that awful knowledge was upon him. They flocked out from Jerusalem to see him pass the street.* Children might point to him as they did afterwards to Dante in Florence. He held in his keeping the experience for which the world is sighing. If he loosed his tongue, how men would hang upon his words, and hear a tale more wonderful than it ever fell to man to tell. Were the links of memory unbroken, or was there a gap like what a fever leaves? Did he maintain a fixed reserve, or did Martha and Mary and John listen to his story while yet a "silence sealed the lips of that Evangelist?" These are questions that spring up whether we will or no, to which we can return no answer. It would harmonise with his character if we suppose him silent and self-involved; it would be in keeping with all that we have felt if he bore the mark of his marvellous rescue to his second grave.† What he had seen beyond may well have sent him back to life with a more solemn sense of its issues, and of sin, and of the mystery of conscience and the face of God. The voice that summoned him by an irresistible obedience from which the supremest obstacles fell away may have retained a special power, and calm unhesitating submission to the will of God may have characterised his life.‡ He had brought back the fact that death was conquered, so that not by faith alone, but by actual trial he knew that Christ, his friend, was Lord and Master of the grave and the future, who openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth; and the consciousness of this must have been curiously inwoven with the texture of everyday thought and human experience.

* Professor Plumptre in his article on Lazarus in "Smith's Dictionary of the Bible," and in the notes to his poem on the same subject, ("Lazarus and other Poems,") says all that can be said for this hypothesis, as well as for the identity of the young ruler with Lazarus. His argument on this latter point is extremely ingenious and interesting. The Lazarus of his poem, and of the more dramatic "Epistle of Karshish," in Mr. Browning's "Men and Women," is a fine ethical study, and extremely suggestive.

From all speculation upon his fate and after-character we may turn to one fixed point, to which the very silence of the Gospels draws us. They are careless to satisfy our curiosity, to lead us one step into the wonder-world. They restrain us by a wise and impassable and pregnant Thus far. Lazarus, by his miraculous resurrection, is isolated from us, and has no help to give us out of that special act of his life. It helps us to know more of Christ. Men stare at the wonder, but faithful souls recognise the Wonder-worker, not only in a miracle grey with age, but in the continuous providence of God. We have a clear glimpse into the vastness of Christ's dominion, spreading out over the furthest confines of things visible into unknown regions of the invisible; we have by anticipation one vivid act of that great series that the Resurrection and the Last Day will unfold; though we see not yet all things put under Christ, we can feel that virtually they are under Him, and we gain whatever courage this may throw into our faith. But to produce this result, Lazarus need have been no more than any one man out of millions,—a human unit without a story, without an interest. For any help that he can give us, we must look to something else than miracle,—to such relations to Christ and the world as we might share with him. Wonder and awe went with him through the world and set him apart: yet the deepest mark he bore was that he was Jesus' friend. The miracle might have been wrought indifferently on any one that was dead; the friendship was a personal relation peculiar to the man that was a friend. A like miracle was wrought on the daughter of Jairus, on the young man of Nain, yet there was apparently no relation between their families and Christ. Miracles were wrought for those who never claimed his help as a spiritual Teacher, and for the miracle's sake men might be pursued by staring crowds, and be no friends of his. Wonders are done for men daily by Him who made the world and keeps it. They are not indifferent to them, and they perhaps become conspicuous among their neighbours for some almost incredible deliverance, but no one thinks of calling them even disciples of Jesus. We may see in these acts proofs of the power, government, interposition of Christ; and the acts of Christ are mighty, and the mightiest is no doubt the resurrection. But there is something deeper in the story of Lazarus than proofs of the divinity of Jesus, deeper than the wonder that filled men's mouths with curious talk, deeper and more wonderful. The friendship out of which the story springs is its greatest marvel. For mere strangeness, no passage into the world of spirits nor giving of life to a dead man can equal that. And then what infinite pathos! Nowhere do we gain a profounder sense of the new relation between God and man, of the intimate union that is possible between Christians and Christ,—of its tenderness, sympathy, and breadth. Nowhere can we better feel that we ought to throw ourselves on Christ with less reserve,—that He may be touched at any point in the range of human feeling,—that fellowship with Him should be practical, and have a human and not a purely ideal basis. And while our life may be devoid of all that is marvellous, and probably will be, in this we may be sharers through the grace of God, that the Friend of Lazarus is also ours.

PSALMS.

PSALM III.—Domine, quid multiplicati.

FASTER yet their bands are flocking,
Prouder yet their banners wave,
Cruel scorning, bitter mocking,—
Lord, they say thou canst not save!

Spread Thy shield above, around me,
Pour Thy glory on my brow;
Even they can not surround me,
While my sure defence art Thou.

Though my voice was faint and weakly,
Night hung o'er me clear and still;
Past the stars it echoed quickly,
Piercing to His holy hill.

He my griefs and fears assuaging,
Calm I laid me down to rest,
Dreamed I heard the battle raging,
Woke on His sustaining breast.

Now I will not shrink nor tremble,
Though with shouts the air is rent,
Though ten thousand foes assemble
Round my lonely battle-tent.

Rise, O Lord my God! and save me,
In Thy holy arm I trust;
All who still resist and brave me
By Thy stroke shall lick the dust.

Thine be glory and salvation,
Hymn of battle, temple-psalm;
Saved by Thee, the holy nation
Lay before Thee crown and palm.

PSALM XXIII.—Dominus regit me.

HE is my Shepherd, I His sheep;
I do not want to know
Whether the way be soft or steep,
By which I am to go.
If green and smooth the mountain be,
I need not ask for more;
If stony, He will carry me,
As He has done before.

He is my Shepherd, I His sheep;
We travel onward still,
By pools where water-lilies sleep,
By many a quiet hill;
I feed in many a grassy dell,
I drink the waters clear;
The gracious voice I know so well
Is music to my ear.

He is my Shepherd, I His sheep;
I wandered once, I know,
I heard Him on the mountains weep
That I should leave Him so.
I trembled as I faintly guessed
A sorrow so divine,
For as He clasped me to His breast
The blood gushed forth on mine.

He is my Shepherd, I His sheep;
And what if death be near?
The shadows up the valley creep,
And yet I do not fear;
As closer to His side I cling,
I feel the cross so true,
With which His love was pledged to bring,
And safe has brought me through.

He is my Shepherd, I His sheep;
We journey on and on,
At last the smile upon his lip
Shall tell me all is won.
The table that He spreads for me
My foes shall all behold,
And in these trembling fingers see
His cup of royal gold.

The cup He put so gently by
When death was drawing near,
He freely fills for such as I,
And tells me not to fear.
And for those funeral odours shed
Upon His dying brow,
He pours the oil of joy instead
On each disciple now.

Shepherd! Good Shepherd! turn and see,
I follow far behind,
Thy voice of mercy calling me
Comes borne on every wind.
Set wide thy Father's open door,
That I the light may see,
And in His house for evermore
At last abide with Thee.

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.

JUST when the returns of the cattle-plague had fallen so low as to justify the belief that that visitation was at an end, the sudden and awful outbreak of cholera in London came to remind us how much greater evils God may send on us than the destruction of our cattle. Walking as the pestilence always does in darkness, and often directing its course with a seeming caprice that no theory can reduce to law or reason, it pounced on this occasion at once on the heart of the empire; and the natural awe occasioned by its outbreak was greatly increased by its establishing itself, at the hottest period of the year, in the very quarter where the field for its ravages was largest, and the conditions most favourable for its rapid diffusion. For nowhere are the evils of filth and overcrowding, deficiency of water and of air, absence of cleanliness, and general depression of the vital system more prevalent than in the east of London, and nowhere is that class more abundant that are usually the first victims of cholera—those who have no stated or defined way of living, and whose uncertain earnings naturally give rise to an irregular and unwholesome manner of life. If the permanent improvements that shall result from this "explosion of disease" (as it has been called) be at all in proportion to the present efforts to meet and check its ravages, it will have a place among those chastisements which though not for the present joyous but grievous, nevertheless afterwards work the peaceable fruits of righteousness. If it so multiply men like Alderman Waterlow and Mr. Peabody, that wholesome and airy dwellings shall become the rule, instead of the exception, for London working men; if it give such emphasis to the warnings of Dr. Jeafferson, that a sufficient supply of clean water shall be provided for every family; above all, if it give rise to a solemn sense of God's presence, and if it so quicken the zeal of all who are labouring for the spiritual elevation of the masses, that the cry for the breath of heaven shall be heard from all parts of the valley of dry bones, and every agency of regeneration and of improvement shall be plied with double zeal, the merciful character of the visitation will be conspicuous, even in the midst of its desolations. It is interesting to be told that a spirit of religious concern appears to be diffusing itself over the regions that have been visited by the disease. It must be the prayer of every pious reader that this spirit may become deeper and more defined, so that this portentous messenger may usher in, not only for the east of London and the metropolis, but for the whole land, a brighter and better day than any but those whose faith can remove mountains have ventured to anticipate.

The successful laying of the Atlantic cable between this country and America is one of those events which cannot fail to stir even the most sluggish imaginations. That it is destined to have an important influence on the future relations of Great Britain and the United States, all seem to feel; and while, to a certain extent, it can be foreseen what will probably be its bearing in this respect, it seems also to be felt that there may be grander developments connected with it than we can yet conceive. It is satisfactory to note that there has not anywhere been a discordant voice to the general expression of desire that it may bind Great Britain and the United States in closer and happier bonds, and no one probably would not rather that it should lose its cunning and become utterly useless, than that it should ever carry across the ocean a declaration of war between two such countries. Attention has been called to the manifest interference of Providence in preventing the electrical connection of the two countries from being carried out when it was first attempted, and the idea has been suggested, that possibly, at a time when serious misunderstandings had arisen, when national feeling was extremely keen, and when the American people were much excited by their domestic war, a rupture between the two countries might have been the result, had electric messages, that left no time for deliberation and calming down, been passing between them. In the providence of God, that time of excitement was made to pass by before it became possible to send a message and to receive the answer in the course of a few hours. It is wonderful to think that the lightning and the ocean, so long looked on as the most terrible foes with which man had to contend, have been so wonderfully subdued to his purposes that by means of them he can bring the most distant parts of the globe into almost immediate communication, and greatly advance his interests and his plans. Would only that the boon of which we have now got possession may be constantly used in a humble spirit, and dedicated to the glory of God and the good of man!

The 123rd Annual Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Ministers has been held at Leeds. The President selected on this occasion,—the Rev. William Arthur, A.M., author of "The Tongue of Fire,"—is a much younger man than has almost ever filled that office, and the first, it is said, who has been trained in a Wesleyan Institution; but his remarkable combination of gifts and graces, his great fervour of spirit, weight of character, and experience of men and affairs, amply justified the choice. The statistical and other returns indicate a certain amount of progress, the number of members of the society being 331,193, and of those on trial 20,819, showing an increase of 366 on the previous year. There seemed, however, to be a deep feeling that the spiritual efficacy of the society,—its influence on the world lying in wickedness,—was not advancing with the manifest force and rapidity that were to be desired and expected in a condition of great vitality and Divine power; that the open paganism and vice of great cities, and the abounding worldliness and carelessness of men everywhere, were not disappearing, as they might be expected to disappear, before the agencies that were brought to bear against them. A very solemn and earnest meeting was accordingly held to consider the state of the work of God. The address of Mr. Arthur was so impressive that on his resuming his chair there was an interval of several minutes of the most profound and solemn silence. He laid great stress on the class-meetings, as forming the very life of Methodism, and the pulse of its spiritual vitality. The trust bequeathed to them by John Wesley was not merely a form of order, but of pure doctrine and holy discipline; not merely the discipline of prudential regulations, but the supreme enforcement of Christ's law of holiness over all their members. In the character of the Christian bishop, the two musts of St. Paul were indispensable—he must be blameless, and he must be well reported of them that are without. He prayed that God would perfect his love in their hearts, and save thousands of souls. The meeting responded to the solemn appeals of the President, and the expression of purpose and desire by several of the ablest ministers was quite in the same direction.

It is interesting to find that the yearning for Christian union which is manifesting itself so strongly in other branches of the Church is also operating among several of the Methodist denominations. Overtures on the subject have been passing between the "New Connexion" and the "United Methodist Free Churches," and now the New Connexion comes into correspondence with the parent Wesleyan body. At its conference in Birmingham a few weeks before, the New Connexion (which dates from 1797), passed resolutions in favour of closer union and fellowship among the different sections of the Methodist body, and empowering a committee to take such preparatory steps towards this consummation as should be in accordance with their rules, and fitted to promote the prosperity and harmony of the churches. The Wesleyan Conference agreed to refer the matter to a small committee. The "United Methodist Free Churches," which have been holding their Conference at Sheffield, have declared in favour of "brotherly love and friendly intercourse with all the liberal branches of Methodism," and appointed a committee to meet with the committee of the New Connexion.

From a statement made in the Wesleyan Conference by Dr. Scott, of Canada, it appears, that, as in the matter of Presbyterian union, the Colonial churches have taken the lead in this question. In Canada, conferences have taken place between representatives of the Old Connexion and the Wesleyan body, and the result had been beneficial in strengthening the spirit of brotherly love and Christian union; but no disposition had been evinced by any of the ministers to alter the constitution of their respective churches.

The proposal, on the part of the bishops of the Church of England, to institute an order of "lay-readers," seems an acknowledgment of the value of the principle which has given so much strength to Methodism and other Nonconformist bodies,—of making use of all the gifts and graces which God has given to the ordinary members of the Church. According to a statement by the Bishop of Peterborough, the Church had not the means of utilising all the talents which were abundantly bestowed, and of which other bodies had to some extent availed themselves. The Bishops had had a meeting at Lambeth on the subject, which was attended by seventeen or eighteen archbishops and bishops, English and Colonial, and a plan had been agreed to by which men of leisure, piety, zeal, and holiness of life, if willing to devote themselves to the Lord's work, would be appointed to do so. He had heard of half-pay officers in the army, retired barristers, country gentlemen, who had the ability, and were willing to take this office on themselves. They made it unpaid for various reasons; they did not wish to make it a profession; they wanted it to be a matter of zeal and love for religion.

Some time ago it was announced that Mr. Charles J. Hemans, the son of the poetess, had returned to the Church of England, after having been for ten or twelve years a convert to Romanism. An interesting letter has been published, in which Mr. Hemans explains the reasons of his re-conversion. "Having," he says, "been induced during the many years spent by me at Rome, to examine into the evidences of Christian antiquity in the range of catacomb monuments, and having approached that study with a strong sense of the value of those primitive records, as the incorrupt and pure expression of the mind of the early Church, I have been finally led to see, that between the picture of a past reality there presented and the actual religious practice of Rome, exists an opposition affecting essentials—an irreconcilability, in short, which I believe no amount of ingenious erudition, no argumentation or sophistry, can either explain away or harmonise." He proceeds to say that on two great points he found the opposition insurmountable; the absence of any recognition by the early Church of an earthly head in the successors of St. Peter, and the absence of any trace of creature-worship or Mariolatry. The recent Encyclical, and other evidences of the rotten state of the Papacy, have had their weight with Mr. Hemans in coming to the conclusion he has reached. Still, he says, that in the Romish system there is much that is holy, beautiful, and useful, and that many pure and truth-loving minds will be found among her adherents; yet he has been led to the painful conviction, that it is rather [illegible] interests of a potent system by which her zeal for the [illegible] animated, than pure uncompromising love of truth.

The magnitude of the blow which the Papacy has received by the humiliation of Austria is gradually becoming apparent. Attention is turned to the decadence of those countries which bow to the sceptre of Rome, and their utter want of ability to cope with the vigour of the Protestant nations. It is some time since Spain ceased to be a great power, and Austria would now seem to be following in its wake. France and Italy are vigorous and bold, but both have spurned the Papal yoke, although they have not become Protestant. The consternation that prevails at Rome is said to be very great. Austria, as an able journalist has remarked, the last of the great ultramontane Powers, has been hopelessly beaten. The new Germany that is rising on her ruins is either Protestant or liberal Catholic, and is ruled by a king who is almost fanatically Lutheran. The world, as it appears at the Vatican, will be divided between six great states, and of these France will be Voltairian, Prussia Lutheran, Britain, on all Papal questions, Calvinistic, Russia Greek and hostile, Italy Catholic but anti-Papal, and Austria Papal, but bound by the evil prejudices of the Hungarians. The changes, too, are so sudden and violent as to leave no room for intrigue. Things are worse than in 1848, when, despite the spirit of liberalism, the Papacy had great powers behind her; and far worse than in 1800, when her calamities depended on a single man. It is most interesting to Protestants to think that in such countries as Bohemia and Hungary, the long-crushed plant of Protestantism has now some chance of recovering its vigour, as it has done in some measure among the Vaudois and in the north of Italy. That loss of prestige which has befallen the Papacy, that rude dissipation of her mysterious glory which has had such an effect in subduing men's minds and keeping them subdued, may now, in Austria, as for some time past in Italy, awaken a spirit of religious inquiry, and create a thirst for the Word of God. While we cherish such hopes in regard to the issue of the wonderful events of the past few weeks, we are of course not to be held as approving of the means by which these events have been accomplished. Wherever injustice and violence have prevailed, God will take his own way of punishing them; but not the less may He make the events themselves instrumental in preparing the way for the triumphs of the Gospel.

In the midst of the atrocities of the war, there is a pleasure in remarking the zeal and devotedness with which it has been endeavoured to mitigate its horrors in the hospitals. Among those who have devoted themselves to the work of Christian charity may be mentioned the establishment of Deaconnesses at Berlin, Kaiserswerth, Breslau, and Konigsberg. The house of Deacons of Duisburg has sent thirty of its brethren to the fields of battle, and the establishments of the Rauhe-haus, near Hamburg, have not been behind. The depôts of the British and Foreign Bible Societies at Berlin, Cologne, and Frankfort have been abundantly supplying the armies with the Holy Scriptures.

In Austria, also, much care has been bestowed on the wounded. In Pesth, very opportunely, the first Protestant hospital in Hungary had just been opened, under the auspices of the Rev. Rudolph Kœnig, missionary of the Free Church of Scotland, and pastor of the German congregation in that city. Two deaconnesses had been sent from Kaiserswerth to aid in the hospital, and others were on their way, or in training. When the wounded thousands arrived from the seat of war in Bohemia, application was made to Mr. Kœnig for nurses to supply a new hospital opened in Pesth, which application Mr. Kœnig undertook to supply. Some of the leading members of the German Protestant congregation have formed themselves into a society for visiting the sick in the hospitals, and supplying them with tracts, Bibles, and Testaments. The small beginning of the 2nd of January has thus widened out into a considerable stream of Christian activity, on which, both in its temporal and its spiritual exertions, there is good cause to hope an ample blessing may rest.

The progress of evangelical work in France, if not very marked, is, in some districts, not the less real. "We hear of spots," says the correspondent of Christian Work, "where the Lord is awakening Christians to active work and increased prayer; and others where, without any new agency from without, except, perhaps, the prayerful distribution of a few tracts, souls apparently dead in sinful carelessness are awakening to the consciousness of their danger, and to the all-importance of securing their eternal welfare. In the Gard and the Lozère we hear of a person here and there having found peace, and, in the joy of possession, reading aloud a tract to fellow-travellers in a coach or elsewhere, and then in villages around, until little meetings of three or four become crowded, and sixty or seventy persons join the prayers with an earnestness never before manifested. In the Ariege a striking little tract has also been remarkably blessed in connection with a small meeting of four persons, who met two months ago in their pastor's parlour; the number increased successively to eight, twelve, twenty, forty, and at last overflowed the apartment and adjourned to the church, where the happy pastor welcomes between three and four hundred souls every evening, anxious, as they had never yet been, to hear the words of eternal life. We must not forget that behind the noise of party skirmishing in the Churches, and the deadly warfare of contending elements from without, there are thousands of simple souls going their regular round of duties, more or less sleepily, more or less intelligently, not in the least affected by the clamour of combatants they probably have never heard of."

Syria is again desolated by the plague of locusts. At the very time when Captain Baker has discovered one of the largest fresh-water lakes in the world among the sources of the Nile, bearing the name of the "Lake of Locusts," and supplying an interesting proof how terrific the desolations of that creature may have been in ancient Egypt, the inhabitants of Hasbeyia, Nazareth, Nablous, and other well-known places in Syria and Palestine have been reduced to utter poverty and misery by their terrific assaults. In 1855, the Christians did all in their power to destroy the locusts and their eggs, whilst the Mahommedans caught and ate them as a great delicacy. Notwithstanding, their ravages this year are more terrible. They have entered the houses of the people as they never did before. Two babies left in a house in Hasbeyia were choked by them, and died. The Rev. F. A. Klein, of the Church Missionary Society, writes that while in some places the barley crop has escaped, the olive-trees, fig-trees, and vines have been stripped of their foliage, and the distress of the people is overwhelming. "Some days ago, one of our people from Boi Zeit came to me quite broken-hearted. Owing to the destruction occasioned to the vineyards last year, the poor fellow borrowed money at fifty per cent., hoping to be able to pay back capital and interest from the produce of this year. Now the locusts have destroyed his olive crop, his fig-trees, his vineyard, his only means of support. 'Is not the last day near at hand?' he said to me with a voice choked with grief and emotion. 'I understand that such scourges, hunger, and wars between the various nations, are signs of the last day.' I read to him the second and third chapters of Joel, and every now and then he said, 'Oh, how true!' He said he would get these chapters read to all his friends on his return to the village. I could not help shedding a tear at the sorrowful account this man gave me, with so much grief, yet at the same time with so much resignation to the Lord's will." Dr. Sandreckzi describes the locusts as he saw them advancing towards Jerusalem. "They fell upon the city and all the country surrounding it in such multitudes that almost everything verdant was eaten up within four days. A few locusts of the largest size (six and seven inches long) were caught at Bethlehem, I think. I myself have seen about twenty-two different species of them. At Tiberias, the cholera has broken out, and at Nazareth small-pox and the measles are raging."

An interesting illustration of the value of Medical Missions, especially where ordinary missionaries are not allowed to prosecute their work, has occurred at Sirinagur, in Cashmere. Three years ago, two missionaries of the Church Missionary Society entered the valley, but were obliged to return. In 1864, Mr. Clark, one of the two, renewed the attempt, accompanied by his wife and some trustworthy native assistants. On arriving at Sirinagur, they were mobbed by a large crowd, who theatened to set the house on fire. The authorities could not be induced to afford them protection, and on one occasion, when a great fire had occurred, and a subscription had been made for the sufferers, they were obliged by the authorities to refund it, because Mr. Clark and some native Christians had subscribed to it. Inquirers who came to him were punished and imprisoned, and after trying the effect of removing to a house outside the city, and of an appeal by the British Resident, Mr. Clark was obliged to leave. It was evident, however, that it was not the people but the government that were hostile to the mission. Next year the Rev. W. Handcock and Dr. Elmslie entered the Cashmere territory, Dr. Elmslie as a medical missionary. At Sirinagur he rented part of a bungalow belonging to a native merchant, consisting of a large room and three verandahs, which he fitted up as hospitals and a surgery. Mr. Handcock, finding that no opportunity of preaching could be had, was obliged to leave the territory, but Dr. Elmslie remained. The number of patients who came to him was considerable, and some came for surgical operations, such as the removal of tumours. By means of chloroform he was able to perform the operations without giving pain, and as the operations were successful, a great impression was produced on the people. A religious service is held with the applicants every morning before the distribution of medicine or the giving of advice begins, and Bibles and tracts are distributed among the people as opportunity offers. In this way, as well as by itinerating journeys on Saturdays, the Gospel is more or less made known in a district from which its regular preachers are determinedly excluded.

Interesting tidings have been received in connection with the work of another medical missionary, Dr. Lowe, of Travancore, and his associates. It would seem that during the week of united prayer last January, a deeply earnest and solemn feeling seemed to pervade the services, and many interesting results have followed. On the 12th a meeting was held at Kádamálei Kúmm, in one of the largest chapels of the district, accompanied by remarkable tokens of the Divine blessing. The exhibition of lively emotion in connection with preaching is so rare among the people, that the manifestations of it this day were the more remarkable. It seems to have resembled a revival meeting at home. Some faces indicated depths of distress, others showed hearts rejoicing with joy unspeakable and full of glory. Meetings for prayer and conversation among the people followed. Some who had known the depths of sin were pierced to the heart, prodigals were restored, and formalists quickened; and even the very ignorant were sometimes enabled to see salvation so clearly that nothing could deprive them of their treasure. The missionaries hope, from these and other symptoms, that a brighter day is dawning on Travancore.

In addressing the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland last June on the state and prospects of Christianity in India, Dr. Duff gave a very interesting account of a remarkable young man, a leading member of the Brahma Somaj, Baboo Khesub Chunder Sen, who has been exciting great attention and interest among the educated Hindus of Calcutta. He is gifted with a marvellous oratory, which he exercises in the English language, and he is able to hold an assembly of even a couple of thousands of educated Hindus entranced, for two or three hours, as he pours out, like another Chrysostom, the golden streams of his eloquence. It is in itself a remarkable sign of the times, that an audience of this size should assemble and listen to an address in English, and it is still more remarkable that they should come to hear an address on the subject of religion. As the apostle of the reforming section of the Brahma Somaj, Sen of course makes no secret of his contempt for Hinduism. For Christianity he entertains a very high respect, although he be not avowedly a Christian. Recently, says the Friend of India, he delivered an extempore lecture to his countrymen in the theatre of the Calcutta Medical College on "Jesus Christ—Europe and Asia." He sketched the state of the world at the birth of Christ, the life and death of the Saviour of the world, and the progress of the Church till the Reformation, and of Christian missions thereafter. "Humanity," he said, "when Christ appeared, was groaning under a deadly malady, and was on the verge of death; a remedy was urgently needed to save it. Jesus Christ was thus a necessity of the age; he appeared in the fulness of time. He laid down his life that God might be glorified. I have always regarded the cross as a beautiful emblem of self-sacrifice unto the glory of God, one which is calculated to quicken the higher feelings and aspirations of the heart, and to purify the soul, and I believe there is not a heart, how callous and hard soever it may be, that can look with cold indifference on that grand and significant symbol. . . . . Is there a single soul in this large assembly who would scruple to ascribe extraordinary greatness and supernatural moral heroism to Jesus Christ and Him crucified? Was not He who by his wisdom illumined, by his power saved, a dark and wicked world—was not He who has left us such a priceless legacy of Divine truth, and whose blood has wrought such wonders for eighteen hundred years—was not He above ordinary humanity? Blessed Jesus! immortal Child of God! For the world He lived and died. May the world appreciate Him, and follow his precepts!" Of this remarkable man, Dr. Duff further said, that in his intense desire for light, he had asked the prayers of the missionaries on his behalf, and that he was in the habit of conversing with some of them. Should these prayers be answered, and should Sen, as a thoroughly Christian man, devote his remarkable powers to the preaching of Christ among his countrymen, the results that might be looked for, in Dr. Duff's estimation,—making allowance for differences too obvious to require naming—might be worthy to be compared with those which sprung from the conversion of the Apostle Paul.
